

D

000455991

Letter I. 4.

THE ANCIENT CATHEDRAL OF CORNWALL

HISTORICALLY SURVEYED.

By JOHN WHITAKER, B. D.
RECTOR OF RUAN-LANYHORNE, CORNWALL.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

London :
PRINTED FOR JOHN STOCKDALE, PICCADILLY.

1804.

S. GOSNELL, Printer, Little Queen Street, Holborn.

THE ANCIENT CATHEDRAL OF CORNWALL
HISTORICALLY SURVEYED.

CHAPTER FIFTH.

SECTION I.

I HAVE now brushed away those grains of dust in the telescope, which prevented Dr. Borlase from beholding the bright constellation of stars, that was darting its united effusion of radiance upon the Christianity of Cornwall. I have pointed out the stars by name to my readers, and entered them in form upon my catalogue. Yet I have not named all: others remain, provoking my attention, and challenging my admiration. To some of these I now direct my telescope; antiquarianism, like astronomy, continually opening a new world upon the eye, and so carrying on the range of vision to the very extremity of the system.

“The paroch church,” says Leland, concerning St. Ives, at the mouth of the very same current of the Hayle, within which Breaca landed; and, with a reference to one of the very same company of Irish saints that attended Breaca, “is of Iä, a nobleman’s daughter of Ireland, and “disciple of S. Barricius,” the companion of St. Patrick*. “Iä and “Elwine,” the very person that we have seen mentioned in the chapter immediately preceding, as one of Breaca’s companions, “with many “others,” as we have already seen, “came into Cornewaul and landed

* Leland’s Itin, iii. 15: “‘Barricius socius Patritii,’ ut legitur in Vitâ S. Wymeri.”

“ at Pendinas. This Pendinas is the peninsula and stony rok, wher “ now the town of S. Iës (or St. Ives) standith †.” The company of Breaca thus appears to have been embarked in two vessels, and to have entered the Hayle in the night, as I have previously supposed, unseen by each other. One, therefore, having Breaca herself on board, pushed ashore at Rivier, on its eastern bank; and the other, having St. Iä, put to land at the present site of St. Ives, on its western, a site then a “stony rok” merely, and a “peninsula” denominated “Pendinas.” But “one Dinan, a “ great lord in Cornewaul, MADE A CHURCH at Pendinas, AT THE REQUEST “ of Iä, as it is written in St. Ië’s Legende *,” in the history drawn up at or near the time of her death, preserved with religious fidelity at the church erected upon her solicitation, and read with devout attention in that church, during the offices of religion, on the day of her death every year ‡. The Hayle of St. Ives was equally with the Alan of Padstow then, a commodious port of passage from Ireland into Cornwall; but had no town at the mouth of it, as the Alan had, and was therefore entered by this company of high rank and fortune, we may be sure, against their intentions, which must have pointed to Padstow, even merely in their eagerness to reach the land, when they had been driven from their destination. Breaca and her party found Theodore the king of Cornwall, residing in his palace of Rivier, where they landed, and living in the profession of Christianity; while Iä and her party equally found one Dinan, a great lord of the country, inhabiting his house near the ground on which they landed, and equally living in the same profession. Those were permitted by Theodore to fix upon any sites in his kingdom for their habitations, and therefore penetrated

† Pen-dinas signifies literally Hill-head, and was therefore a very common appellation for places in Cornwall. Thus “ the very point of the haven mouth,” at Falmouth, “ being an “ hille, whereon the king hath buildid a castel, is caullid Pendinant.” (Itin. iii. 26.)
 —“ The king hath set his castel on Pendinas—Pendinas almost an isle.” (Ibid. ibid.)
 “ The point of land betwixt S. Just ereke and S. Maws,” and nearly opposite to the other, which is still so denominated, “ is of sum caullid Pendinas.” (Ibid. 29.)

* Leland’s Itin. iii. 21, 22.

‡ Hence comes the name legenda or legend, by the Protestant interpretation of these histories having now lost its original meaning, and come to signify merely a lying story.
 deeply

deeply into it, with Elwine ‡. While these settled with Iä about the new chapel, erected for them in the old parish of Lanant, and Pendinas rose into a town under her chapel's appellation of St. Iës §.

But we can lengthen out this list of saints. With Iä came her two brothers, brothers equally in nature and in affection, brothers in a high relish for religion, in a tender love for sequestration, in a fond feeling of devoutness. "Saint Hya, that is, Saint Hy," as her name is now varied a little by another author, "lies a virgin in the parish church of ‡ Leland's Itin. iii. 15, 16: "'Breaca ædificavit eccl. in Trenewith et Talmeneth,' ut legitur in Vitâ S. Elwini," who must therefore have accompanied her.

§ The real name of the town, even as written in the days of Leland, is St. Iës; though by an English assimilation of the name to that of the town in Huntingdonshire, which is denominated from St. Ivo, a Persian (Leland's Itin. iv. 159—161), it is equally denominated St. Ives at present. The hill of Pendinas, at our St. Ives, is still called Dinas or Dennis, but with an addition from the Saint, Dennis Eia; while the residence of Dinan assuredly was that very house in the vicinity of St. Ives, which is traditionally denominated a castle to this day; and from its other denomination of Tregenna (in English, moor-house), gave name to the family more recently resident within it, even existing there to the days of the first James; and in a younger branch, probably existing at Mawgan, near St. Columb, within these few years. Norden's map of Penwith hundred notices Tregenno, "M. Tregenno;" Norden's Description, p. 42, "Tregenno—the howse of Mr. Tregennor;" map of Pyder hundred, for the parish of Mawgan, "Polgreen, Jo. Tregenna;" Description, p. 68, "Polgreene—the howse of John Tregenno, situate upon the north sea;" and in p. 103, in "a Catalogue of Gentlemen and of their Dwellings," are "Tregenno at Tregenno," with "Tregenno, John, at Polgreene." Walker, in his Sufferings of the Clergy, 423, remarks, "Tregenna, John; he succeeded Mr. Gammon," the last of three rectors whom tradition recognises as Ham, Gammon, and Bacon, "in the rectory of Mawgan, which he made a shift to keep, but with great trouble and difficulty," till 1660-1, "and died possessed of it in the year 1683; he was a person of good learning, eminent piety, and sweetness of conversation." He was succeeded in the living by his son, and the latter again by his son, all equally John Tregenna, with Norden's proprietor of Polgreen, and all equally proprietors of Polgreen with him. The name of the family ended in 1754, the last rector leaving only daughters. All this would have appeared more authoritatively, as well as more circumstantially detailed, I presume, if the late Mr. Tregenna one day, on his maiden aunt's production of the family genealogy to him, had not snatched it from her in a paroxysm of indignation, that might seem to him a dignified superiority to family pride, yet was really (I fear) a sacrifice on the altar of personal vanity, and thrust it hastily into the fire.

“ the town of Saint Hy, upon the northern sea, about twelve miles “ from the farthest end of the western kingdom of England; and “ her day is observed on the third of February *,” as it still is on the Sunday next after the morrow of the Purification. She “ was the “ sister of Saint Herygh, and the sister of Saint Vuy †.” At a very little distance from her, both these brothers took up their residence.
 One of them, “ SAINT HERYGH,” resided apparently in that adjoining parish of Erghe; which, in the ignorance of the English about our saints, and concerning our pronunciation, has had its name anglicised into Erth, and was then supposed to have been dedicated to an unknown saint of this name, plainly one of English origin; but is apparently denominated from this brother to St. Iä, “ whose day is observed “ on the vigil of All Saints, that is, on the last day of October,” as it still is at St. Erth’s on the Sunday nearest to the festival of All Saints. The other brother, “ Saint Vuy, the brother of Saint Herygh ‡,” was actually denominated SAINT VNY in pronunciation, and is mis-written Vuy only from an accidental viciousness of reading, that had no pronunciation to correct it; but settled himself in his devout retirement at the neighbouring parish of Uny Lanant, or Lalant, because “ he lies in the parochial “ church of St. Vuy [Vny], near the village of Lalant, upon the northern “ sea, three miles from Mount St. Michael, where his feast is kept on “ the first day of February §,” as it still is on the Sunday next to the eve

* Itineraria—Wⁱ Worcester, p. 106: “ Sancta Hya, id est, Seynt Hy,—jacet in ecclesiâ “ parochiali villæ Seynt Hy, super mare boreale circa 12 miliaria ab ultimo fine occidentalis
 “ regni Angliæ; et ejus dies agitur tertio die Februarii.”

† Ibid. ibid. “ Sancta Hya,—soror Sancti Herygh, et soror Sancti Vuy.”

‡ Ibid. ibid. “ Sanctus Herygh, frater Sancti Vuy,—jacet in quâdam ecclesiâ,” &c.
 “ Ejus dies agitur in vigiliâ omnium Sanctorum, id est ultimo die Octobris.” The name of Erghe had been so long anglicised into Erth, in Leland’s time, that he repeatedly speaks of Saint Erth in Itin. iii. 20, and that if the second Valor had not caught the original name, it would have been for ever lost; the first noticing it by its secular name of Lanhudnou, Lan Udnou, or the Church upon Udnou, a manor (I suppose) so called, to which the name of Udnou Parva, now Piran Uthnoe, apparently referred, and refers back.

§ Ibid. ibid. “ Sanctus Vuy, frater Sancti Herygh, jacet in ecclesiâ parochiali Sancti “ Vuy propè villam Lalant, super mare boreale, per tria miliaria de Mont-Myghell; ejus “ dies agitur die primo Februarii.”

of the Purification. Thus did the two brothers, with a steady flame of affection, that throws a blaze round the heads of all, unite with their sister in life, and hardly divide from her even in death; taking their course with her from Ireland, fixing with her in Cornwall, fixing in her very vicinity for life, and then lying down in her very vicinity at death.

Yet with these saints, both of them equally with their sister unknown to Dr. Borlase, plainly landed another, who is actually mentioned by the Doctor, the period of whose coming is also conjectured by the Doctor to have been about the year 400, and the varied orthography of whose name has caused him to be split by the Doctor into two*. “PIRAN,” notes Leland, from an ancient life of the Saint, in his very useful mode of extracting the biography of saints, “who is called also Pieran “and Kyeran, was born in Ireland, within the province of Ostrige; “Domuel was the father of Piran, his mother was called Wingela; Piran “was the disciple of St. Patrick. Piran came into Britain; Piran died “and was buried in Britain; Wingela, the mother of Piran, inhabited “in a place near her son with holy virgins†.” The notes of Piran’s birth in Ireland, of his discipleship to St. Patrick there, of his coming into Britain, dying in Britain, and being buried in Britain; all unite to identify his person, to ascertain his chronology, and to fix him with the company of St. Breaca, before in the region of Cornwall. He was indeed, like Barricius and Sinninus before, the companion of St. Patrick. He was even more than this, being one of four clergymen that preached the Gospel in Ireland prior to St. Patrick. A native of Ireland, born about the year 352, of noble parents, in the region of Ossory, and bred up in the islet that gives denomination to Cape Clear; he became a Christian in heart and mind, from the conversation of some laical Christian there; went therefore to Rome, was there initiated into Christianity by baptism, and spent twenty years there, studying the

* Borlase, 369 and 388.

† Leland’s Itin. iii. 195: “Ex vitâ Pirani. ‘Piranus, qui et Pieranus et Kyeranus, de “Hiberniâ oriundus in provine. Ostrige. Domuel pater Pirani, mater ejus Wingela “dicta. Piranus discipulus S. Patritii. Piranus venit in Britann. Piranus obiit et sepultus est “in Britanniâ. Wingela, mater Pirani, in loco propè filium cum sanctis virginibus “habitabat.’”

Scripturæ, collecting copies of them, or preparing himself for orders. Being ordained, and even raised to the highest rank in orders, the episcopate, he returned into Ireland about 402, to convert his countrymen. He converted his mother (his father, I suppose, being now dead), his immediate countrymen of Ossory, and a number of others; thus becoming the first in time, of all the apostles of Ireland*. Having now triumphed in that greatest of external acts of goodness, the conversion of many to religion and to God; he did what was still greater, he triumphed internally over himself. And as we are told by an ancient biographer of another of the four preachers, antecedent to St. Patrick, while this preacher and two of the rest refused, “Chiuran shewed all “concord and subjection and discipleship to St. Patrick, present or “absent †.” Hence he came to be denominated by his own biographer in Leland, “Piran the disciple of St. Patrick.” He then appears to have retired into that solitude, which is so congenial to the feelings of devoutness in general, and seems to have been so peculiarly soothing to the hearts of all these sainted personages; living in a small cell by a fountain, as a hermit, within an extensive forest of Leinster, at a place

* Usher, 410: “In Vitâ ipsius quam MS. habeo:—‘Pater ejus—erat de nobilioribus “gentis Osraigi—; conceptus est—Kiaranus, natusque, et nutritus est—in Clerâ insulâ.’ “—Circa annum CCCLII. natus est Kiaranus.” P. 412: “‘Triginta annis S. Kiaranus “—in Hiberniâ habitavit sine baptismo—sed—audiens famam Christianæ religionis in urbe “Romæ esse,—adivit Romam; perveniensque illuc, baptizatus est et doctus in fide Catholicâ, “ibique viginti annis mansit, legens Divinâs Scripturas, librosque earum colligens.’— “Anno CCCLXXXII. Romam adiisse, et CCCCII. in patriam rediisse, Kiaranum com- “perimus.” P. 413, 414: “Ipsum vero Kiaranum collecta, quæ in officio ejus olim “legebatur, ita celebrat, ‘Deus, qui B. Kiaranum seniore, confessorem tuum atque pon- “tificem, ante alios sanctos in Hiberniæ insulam misisti,’” &c. “Indeque jam dictus “biographus ‘Hiberniæ sanctorum primogenitum’ illum appellat; tum præterea addens, “non modo,—eum matrem ‘fidelem Christianam—effecisse,’ sed etiam, ‘suum gen- “tem, id est Osraigi, et plurimos alios de errore gentilitatis ad Christi fidem convertisse.’” P. 408: “In Vitâ Declani legimus: ‘Quatuor sanctissimi episcopi cum suis discipulis “fuerunt in Hiberniâ ante Patricium, prædicantes in eâ Christum, se. Ailbeus, Declanus, “Ibarus, et Kiaranus’.”

† Usher, 418: “Chiaranus enim omnem concordiam et subjectionem et magisterium “dedit S. Patrio, ipso præsentem et absentem.” From the uncertain writer of the life of Declan, one of the four, the other two being Albeus and Ibarus, denominated “Sier Kerau” from him*. Here his Irish biographer states him to have died; but his British asserts, and the tradition of Cornwall decisively confirms, that he removed into this region of Britain†. His cell in Ireland grew into a monastery, the monastery expanded into a city‡, and the solitude of the hermit was invaded from mere reverence by the world. To escape from the officious intrusion, and to preclude the possibility of repeating it, Piran transported himself over into Cornwall; and came undoubtedly with that Breaca, that Sinninus, that Germochus, Iä, as well as many others, who landed at Rivier, or at St. Ives, but who thence dispersed themselves over the country.

Piran went to the east, as Helen went, while Iä staid at Pendinas on the west, and there settled in a solitude that soon assumed his appellation. “S. Piranes in the sandes,” says Leland, “is an xviii. miles from “S. Iës upward on Severne §.”—“Here,” adds Camden, “is a chapel “erected in the sands to St. Piran, a saint even of Ireland, who rests “at this place ||.” The tradition of the place also reports, that he was forced to float over from Ireland to it upon a millstone; just as another tradition at another place avers St. Petrock to have floated over to Padstow upon an altar ¶. The inhabitants of the parish are almost all

* Usher, 413.

† That Leland’s biographer was of Britain, these words evince: “Piranus venit in “Britann.””

‡ Usher, 413, from Irish biographer: “‘De vili materiâ cellulam suam incepit; et inde “monasterium, et postea civitas, crevit.’”

§ Leland’s Itin. iii. 22.

|| Camden, 140: “In sabulo positum S. Pirano sacellum, qui Sanctus etiam Hibernicus “hic requiescit.” Hence Piran church is called in the Valor of Henry VIII. “Piran in “Zabulo;” and in popular usage, “Piran-Zabulo.” The Cornish name is “Pieran in “Treth;” Piran on Sand, in the old writing relative to estates (Tonkin’s MS. described in the next note); and the parish is therefore said by Norden, 68, with a slight erroneousness, to be called in the Cornish language Peran Kreth, for “Peran Treth.”

¶ From a MS. Parochial History of Cornwall, by the late Thomas Tonkin, Esq. of Trevannance, in St. Agnes, of which a fragment was luckily rescued from immediate ruin by the Rev. Mr. Pye, rector of Truro. I have a copy of this fragment, and have written notes upon it.

tanners: that vast mass of earth, clay, sand, stones, and rock, which spires up in a pyramid, about eighty acres in circumference, and at least ninety fathoms above the sea-level, under the appellation of Saint Agnes Bal, out of which has been raised, for perhaps two hundred years back, the worth of above ten thousand pounds in tin every year §, being within the precincts of the parish, and therefore fixing a large number of tanners within it. These parishioners of St. Piran have given the tone to all the tanners of the county, and exalted St. Piran into the patronage of them all. They all keep his feast upon the fifth of March, hold a fair near his church upon the same day, and have, near the road to Mitchell from the west, at the distance of two or three miles from the church, an arched fountain, denominated Fenton Berran lately, but Piran Well now; the very well, undoubtedly, by which he fixed his hermitage, and from which he drew his beverage*. “The tanners also “hold St. Piran’s day,” notes Dr. Borlase in his Natural History; “cease “from all labour” on the day, “and (in all considerable mines) are “allowed money to make merry withal, in honour of St. Piran, who is “recorded to have given them some very profitable informations relating “to the tin manufacture †.” This oral record the Doctor repeats without reprehension, without suspicion; thus concurs with the tanners in the folly and falsehood of their zeal, by attributing to St. Piran informations that could never have been given by him, by even moulding their holy hermit into a scientific miner. But these votaries of St. Piran have lent at times a contrary direction to their fancy-formed registers; with the stupidity of drunken tanners in their prate, have shaped their saint agreeably to their own practices; and transformed that holy hermit, that venerable bishop, that primary apostle of Ireland, into a wretched drunkard like themselves: nay, this very sottishness of ebriety, like the falsehood of folly above, has made its way to the pen of authors as § Halsp. 3.

* Tonkin’s MS. ; another MS. of his lent me by a descendant, Mr. Jago, of St. Erme; and the great map of Cornwall.

† Borlase, 302.

weak or as vicious as they, and polluted the page of literature with its black current ‡.

Near him settled his mother Wingel, with a society of nuns which she had brought with her; as she had previously settled in a solitary cell near him, within the isle of Ireland*. Where she now settled in Cornwall, I am tempted by my curiosity to conjecture, and I am urged by my subject to conclude. The site can be at no very great distance from Piran. A nunnery must be known from tradition, from records, or from ruins, to have formerly existed there; then, any remains of the name of Wingel, however modified by the mouths of ages, would be a strong confirmation of the whole. And all these circumstances actually unite in Lanivet, a parish about twenty miles from Piran, well known in Cornwall to have once had a nunnery, even shewing the remains of it at this day, and knowing what I take to have been the original site of it, since translated to St. Bennet's, about a mile and a half on the west, by the appellation of Saint Gunger for Saint Gangel at this day †.

Put

‡ In Tonkin's MS. lent me by Mr. Jago, Vertot is cited as concurring with Tonkin in adopting the drunken reveries of tinnors, mediately or immediately, for real facts; but enlarging their absurdity, by making him a Bretoon who was a native of Ireland, and fixing him in Bretagné, who removed only into Cornwall, just as the Bretoon legends have done with other saints of Cornwall. (Lobineau, i. 9.) So much are historians like drunkards at times in their accounts of characters, especially when they want to throw a shade of slander over men illustriously religious!

* Usher, 413, 414: "Addens—cum matrem fidelem Christianam et sanctam Dei famulam effecisse, cellâ quidem in propinquo loco ædificatâ."

† Tanner says only thus: "ii. St. Bennet's, in the parish of Lanivet, nunnery. The tower whereof is yet standing (Tonkin, quære). The tower is standing still, two stories high, having a gateway pretty entire, a flight of winding stairs of stone in an angle of this to a chamber once floored over it, and below in the walls of the tower itself niches horizontal or perpendicular; a single moor-stone hollowed out for a tombstone, forming the bed of those, and these calculated to receive a statue each. There is good reason to suppose that the chapel was standing about the middle of the last century: a fine cloyster certainly extended a few feet from the eastern end of it, ranged north and south, had six windows probably in it, and ended on the north in a small cell, remarkable for two large windows,

But so brightly did the reputation of St. Piran break out from the darkness of his hermitage at Fenton-Berran, and in such a broad flash of lustre did it lighten over all Cornwall, that a parish far removed to the south-west has been long dedicated to him, and is called Piran Uthno, or Little Piran, at this day; that another parish to the south-west, though not so remote, equally adopted his name many ages ago, as I shall instantly shew; and that a chapelry in the parish of Stythian's is now called Piran Arwothal, or Piran Well, the latter name being derived from "a strong chalybeate spring, much frequented of late years *."

We have thus seen the saint denominated Kiaran or Keran in Ireland, Berran or Piran in Cornwall; just as Ceann (I.), a head, is Ben, in Ben Lomond, a mountain of Scotland; and Pen, in Penmanmaur, a mountain of Wales. Yet Dr. Borlase would gladly make Piran different from Kiaran, because a manuscript in Usher's possession states the father and mother of Kiaran to be Lugneus and Liadain, "whereas Piranus was—" "son of Domuel and Wingella †." That very manuscript, however, is cited by Usher himself to mean Piran under the name of Kiaran; and the difference in the names of his parents is noted by Usher as a variation in one of his biographers from the other, the writer of Usher's taken down about twenty-four years ago, and formed of flints, moor-stone rubbish, and lime, in a caisson of large, well-cut moor-stone. They were taken, as other parts of the whole had been before, to build houses or rooms on the owner's lands adjoining. A small bathing-place, with steps descending to it, is all that remains at present besides the tower and its gateway. The architecture of all was handsome, but the extent seems to have been very small, as the site was very confined. It was retired, under a projecting knoll, with a few acres of cultivated land, and a copse of eleven about it, yet not visible from any road adjoining. The parishioners or the owner knew nothing of the founder (from the information of the Rev. Mr. Lake, the obliging rector of the parish); they may therefore be well excused for knowing nothing about St. Gunger, the prior site (as I suppose) of this nunnery, and echoing still in its name, with a faint tone, the appellation of the original founder of both. When the post-diluvian history of man is so little known, we can wonder the less at the ante-diluvian being so nearly a blank.

* Tonkin's MS.

† Borlase, 388.

manuscript from Tinmouth †. But as the names in Tinmouth now appear to be right, from the Life of Piran which I have quoted above, those in Usher's manuscript must consequently be pronounced either false in themselves or additional to the others: that Life also proves the propriety of Usher's considering Kiaran and Piran to be the same personage. "Extracts from the Life of Piran," says Leland: "'Piran, 'who is the same with Pieran and Kyran, was a native of Ireland ‡.' " Leland, therefore, did not call the parish-church of St. Keveryn, a little to the south-west of Falmouth, that "of St. Keveryn, alias of Piranus §," on the mere authority of Tinmouth, as Dr. Borlase supposes ||. Leland had much better, we see; and it does honour to the sagacity of Tinmouth that he has been as accurate as Leland in his researches. This church, too, is denominated in the Valor of Henry VIII. "Keyran, alias St. Keverne;" and in that of Pope Nicholas, "Ecclesia Sancti Keyrani," or "Kiorani." Yet "St. Keveryn and St. Piran," remarks the Doctor with an air of confidence that is suggested solely by his ignorance of these testimonies, and that soars, like the hooded hawk, from the mere inspiration of blindness; "were certainly different persons*." What then is the ground of this certainty, in opposition to such positive evidence? It contradicts not the evidence, but flies to that problematical kind of reasoning which is always the refuge of imbecility and confusion. "Doomsday says," he tells us from Tanner, "'the canons of St. Pieran'" (so exact is Leland's biographer of Piran in reciting a name that under this form occurs only in Doomsday Book and in him!) "'held Lan Piran'," that is, some lands which, from "their belonging to a church of that saint, had the name of Lan Piran," but now are called the church-lands of St. Piran ¶; "and at Piran Sanæ," which

† Usher, 410.

‡ Leland's Itin. iii. 195: "Ex Vitâ Pirani; 'Piranus, qui et Pieranus et Kyranus, de 'Hiberniâ oriundus'."

§ Leland's Itin. iii. 24: "S. Piranes, alias Kenerine," or "Keverine," as afterwards.

|| Borlase, 388.

* Ibid. Ibid.

¶ Tonkin's MS.

a note justly asserts to mean Saint Piran, “ the bishops of Bodmin had “ a manor called Lan Piran,” the present manor of St. Piran, and close adjoining to the church-lands, “ now almost entirely overrun with “ sands *.” Yet where is the force and power of this argument? It was to prove, that St. Piran and St. Keveryn were certainly different persons. But does it prove the point certainly? Does it prove the point probably? Does it prove in any degree of even seeming probability? It does not in any degree; it shews only the canons of St. Pieran to have had some lands at Piran; and it intimates only the bishops of Bodmin, by whom it means merely the bishop and chapter of Exeter, to whom the church was given by one of our kings †, to have had other lands at Piran. But what is either, or what are both, to the design and destination of the argument? How do either or both prove a personal difference betwixt the saints Keveryn and Piran? The mathematical axiom that take equals from equals and equals remain, proves the point just as much. Yet “ we have at present,” subjoins Dr. Borlase in a continuation of the train of reasoning, “ three parochial churches dedicated to “ him [Piran], and two of them are at present in the patronage of the “ church of Exeter: but St. Keveryn does not appear to have had any “ connexion with the bishop of Exeter any otherwise than as its diocesan; “ the patronage is in lay hands ‡.” In such hands, however, the patronage has been only since the Reformation, and previously was not, as it then belonged, with the college or monastery here, to Beaulieu abbey in Hampshire §: so defective is the reasoning at the very close! On the whole, then, the argument suggests not the slightest difference between the saints, and speaks only of a minute, incidental, extraneous difference between the churches. The patronage of St. Kevern, it seems, does not belong to the church of Exeter, as that of Piran in the Sands, and that of Piran Uthnoe does; and therefore—as the argument wishes to conclude, but presumes not to infer—therefore St. Keveryn is a different

* Tonkin, a parishioner, said long before, but with an evident exaggeration, “ now “ wholly destroyed by the sands.”

† Tanner.

‡ Borlase, 388.

§ Tanner.

Saint from St. Piran. Such is the logic of this extraordinary passage! But what is still more extraordinary, the fidelity of it is as bad as the logic; the patronage of Piran Uthnoe being equally in lay hands with that of St. Kevern; and the argument, therefore, if it was not as powerless as it is false, turning against the identity of this St. Piran with the other. Yet what is still more than all, the very patronage of Piran itself was not in the hands of either the bishop or the church of Exeter till the Conquest, till even the reign of Henry I. after it, when he granted the college at Piran to them, as being then in his patronage, when they only succeeded to his in consequence of the grant, and are now patrons of the vicarage from it *. So thoroughly has Dr. Borlase lost himself in the labyrinth of his own reasonings, his clue being very short, his path very long, his resolution to push on very eager, and his quickness to catch the turns very blunt. Piran was the same with Kiaran, Keyran, or Keveryn, the first of the converters of Ireland, prior to Patrick in time, but condescending to rank as second in dignity, and the glorious hermit of Cornwall, who came into Cornwall for the sake of sequestration in a hermitage, not indeed so early as about the year 400, only as early as about 460—another proof additional to the many before in his and Breaca's companions, of the prevalence of Christianity in the country †.

With

* Tanner.

† "Here," cries Dr. Borlase, 388, concerning St. Kevern, in a conjecture which I am happy to applaud after so much reprobation of him, "seems to me to have been a distinct religious house, with lands called Lanachebran, which we find mentioned [in Doomsday Book] as one of our religious houses in Cornwall, but have not known hitherto where to fix it. 'There was a society of secular canons in a place of this name, at or about the Conquest, dedicated to Saint Achebrann'." This is said from Tanner; but let us see Doomsday Book itself: "Canonici Sancti Achebranni tenent Lannachebran, et tenebant tempore regis Edwardi." Yet, as Dr. Borlase goes on, "now this Saint Achebran is not to be found in Cornwall; but St. Chebran there is, commonly called Kevran, the same, doubtless, as called Kiaranus, now called St. Keveryn, in the hundred of Kerrier." For "the letter A before Chebran, whereby they make a Saint Achebran, is no more than a preposition in the Cornish language, signifying of, prefixed to the Saint Chebran or Kevran." In the text of the new edition of Tanner, we accordingly read of "Lanachebran, or Lan-a-Kevran, alias St. Kevran, in the deanery of Kerrier, Cistercian cell," where

With him and with the others came also, I believe, FINGAR, and PIALA, and BUDOC, and BURIEN, and CARANTOC; who complete my catalogue of Irish saints, and close my account of Breaca's companions. Our notices concerning all, however, are very short, little more than sufficient to link them into the great chain that came charged with such a quantity of electrical fire from Heaven, and that dispensed it in such pleasing effusions of light, through a country fully prepared by her own Christianity to retain as well as to receive it.

where was a "society," &c.; and in a note we are told, that "in the former edition this "church [of St. Kevran] was confounded with that of St. Pieran [in the Sands];" that "the late learned prelate Dr. Charles Littleton, bishop of Carlisle," from some communications, probably of Dr. Borlase's, "informed Dr. Tanner of the mistake; and" that "the "account of both churches, inserted in this edition, are [is] agreeable to the information "communicated by him," bishop Littleton; and I cordially unite with all in embracing the opinion. The want of a parish for the Lannachebran of Domesday Book, and the want of notice in Domesday Book for the parish of St. Kevern, unite to shew the one is omitted because the other is mentioned, and the one is mentioned under the name of the other. In the next record too that we have of our churches in Cornwall, the Valor of Pope Nicholas, we find the scene regularly reversed—St. Kevern noticed, and Lannachebran omitted.

"Several considerable ruins are still to be seen," adds Dr. Borlase, "about a quarter of "a mile from the church of St. Kevern, at a place called Tregonin, where there is a tradition among the neighbours," still existing, "that formerly there stood a priory; and a "part of these ruins is still called the chapel." The ruins are gone, but the site is known, and bones have been found in digging at a little distance. "This likely was the house, and "St. Kevern the collegiate church, of these secular canons:" the church being a fine old building, very long, very broad, with a nave and two aisles, the marks of its once collegiate dignity. "These secular canons," the Doctor should also have noticed, had been changed into monks long before the Reformation; the monks had even deserted the house before it, and even then the whole building was in ruins. This appears from a passage in Leland's Itinerary, which the Doctor has carelessly overlooked, though it follows immediately after the mention of "St. Keveryn, otherwise Piranus." For he says "ther is a sanctuary, "with x or xii dwelling howses," the present church-town of St. Kevern; "and therby "was a sel of monkes, but now goon home to ther hed hows. The ruins of the monastery "yet remenith." Even Tanner had told him, that after the Conquest "there was a cell "of Cistercian monks, subordinate to Beaulieu abbey, in Hampshire; and the manor "here," the very Lannachebran of Domesday Book, "as parcell of the possessions of "Beaulieu, was granted 2 Eliz. to Francis earl of Bedford,"

FINGAR

FINGAR or Guigner is noticed by Anselm before, catching the sunbeams of history from the mirror of tradition, catching them much distorted and discoloured, yet still catching them, as landed about the year 460, with a large company of Christians from the shores of Ireland, at the mouth of the Hayle. The position of the parish denominated Gwinear at present from him, St. Wynyar, St. Wyner, or St. Gwyner in the last Valor, and St. Wyner in the first, answers very singularly to this descent of sainted persons upon our shores: it lies immediately contiguous to the ancient and present Rivier. He took up his residence at it, as Iä did at Pendinas; and therefore lent his appellation to that, as she lent hers to this.

But what became of “his sister PIALA?” To ascertain the point we must take a large range in local intelligence, and move in a kind of cometary orbit to our focus, collecting and diffusing light as we sweep along.

In all countries the vallies have been inhabited before the hills, as enriched by the washings of soil from the sides, and as lying more sheltered from the stroke of the winds. In Cornwall they would be peculiarly so, as the land is exposed by its position to peculiar violence of wind, and as the old houses, in consequence of that, are almost all in the bottoms. Thus the parishes of Veryan and Ruan Lanyhorne, each of which has its church in a valley, would there be inhabited before the high grounds to the west of them; those parishes naturally spread up the hills about them, but kept the low lands near their houses for corn and hay grounds, and used the distant grounds above for sheepwalks. At the top of those hills actually lay a large range of land adjoining to the two parishes upon their western side, but bounded by the Fal and the Channel on the other side. These hills reared their heads for ages in one extensive heath, belonging assuredly to both; the northern part to Ruan Lanyhorne, and the southern to Veryan; and they were naturally denominated Rós, the mountain or the heath; and were as naturally denominated when the English came to settle among us in 930, ROSE-LAND; nor are we here deceiving ourselves, as critics often are, in playing with the meteors of etymology. Fact comes in to raise surmise into certainty. Hence only could have originated that traditionary fondness, which is still so predominant in the region, for Roseland mutton in preference to all other. The first parish probably that was formed upon this Rôs, or sheep-walk, was one, which therefore took the appellation of it, is denominated Eglos-rôs, or Heath Church, in the first Valor, and has an estate of the same appellation, lying close to the church at present. Thus, in the third of Henry IV. we find the heir of one Jocus Dynnan possessed of a fee in Trelewith and Eglos-ros *. And what shews the new parish to have been formed out of Ruan Lanyhorne, as the old, there are two fields titheable in common betwixt them; the Higher Congier paying two sheaves to the old and one to the new, while the Lower Congier pays sheaf for sheaf to both. Hence we may learn to wonder at the folly of foreigners, who have turned the name of Roseland into a compliment to the soil, have honoured the mountain above the valley, for fruitfulness, and interpreted a mere range of heath into a garden of roses. Hence too we may learn to smile at the equal folly of the inhabitants, who still pretend to fancy the Roseland mutton, just as the people of Bristol do the Welsh; so continue the language, which was used when that mutton was fed, like this, upon the heathy mountain; yet still affect to continue it, when the mountain is enclosed like the valley, and the heath is formed into rich pastures †. The northern point of the heath being thus graced with a church, and the adjoining parts of the heath being thus moulded into a district by themselves, a chapelry first, and a parish

* Carew, 44: "Hæres Jocci Dynnan ten. in Eglosroset (Eglos-ros), ac in Trelewith, " 1 feod."

† "Their sheep thrive exceedingly," notes Borlase, 82, concerning the Sylley isles, "the grass on the commons being short and dry, and full of the same little snail, which "gives so good a relish to the Sennan and Phillac mutton in the west of Cornwall." The same snail probably abounded on the Rôs, or heath, as it still abounds in some fields of the parsonage at Ruan Lanyhorne; but is generally destroyed by cultivation of the land, though now and then it escapes destruction; upon one field it abounds so much, in spite of all cultivation, as to be felt frequently crashing under the foot in walking.

afterwards; Eglos-ròs, or the Heath Church, now looks down from a mountainous eminence, upon the well-watered vale of Ruan Lanyhorne at its feet ‡.

About the same period probably, that is, about a couple of centuries after this religious descent of the Irish upon our coast, such part of the mountain-heath as lay most adjacent to Veryan, was moulded equally into a parish; and from the royal saint, lately deceased there, was denominated St. Gerens. That this church and the church of Eglos-ros were formed originally about the same period, is suggested not merely by the regular analogy of operation at the sides of Veryan and Ruan Lanyhorne, but by the striking similarity in the site of each to the other's, and the opposition as striking in the sites of both to the sites of their mother-churches; these being lodged in the warm bosoms of two vales, and those perching boldly upon the windy summits of two hills, Eglos-ros upon the northern promontory of the whole, and Gerens upon the southern. But that experience, which had originally driven our ancestors into the shelter of a valley for the mothers, seems to have soon beaten them back into it again for the daughters. The daring deviation could not be recalled indeed; but it was not repeated, in the two parishes that successively occupied the remainder of this tract of hills. The third parish won from the waste, appears to have been that little intake to the west of Gerens, which now constitutes the petty district of St. Anthony; but seems from its very pettiness to have once constituted a part of Gerens district. It seems also, from its participation with Gerens, in being detached from the main body of the county, as to the spiritual jurisdiction over it, being made independent of the archdeacon, and subjected immediately to the bishop himself*. And it seems once more, from that

‡ How directly then, in contradiction to fact, does Mr. Tonkin in MS. interpret Eglos-ròs, "a church in a valley?" Just as directly as he interprets Roseland the name of a congeries of hills, rising one upon the back of the other, with scarce a gully between them; into a "circuit of land in the vale, with a promontory?"

It asks discretion e'en in running mad.

* In the first Valor is "Taxatio peculiaris jurisdictionis domini episcopi." There, under "Decanatus de Penryn," are equally Gerens and St. Anthony.

extraordinary right, which it once possessed, which is still continued derivatively from it, and of which I know no parallel in the whole island; a right to half the revenues of Gerens rectory itself. As a chapel to Gerens it might take a part of its parish, and might receive half of its income. It was thus made a parish, I believe, and thus had a rector; as we know it to be at present, and find it to have had formerly. But it was so made, and so had, I also believe, at the very period in which it was annexed to that free chapel of the king's before the Conquest, that erection of one of our Saxon sovereigns, the collegiate church of Plympton in Devonshire. To this it was annexed, in all probability, at the conquest of Cornwall in 936; when only could an English college come to hold possessions in Roseland, when Athelstan assuredly attached the new rectory to his own or a predecessor's college, and when he made it fit for the college's acceptance by exerting the paramount prerogative of a conquest, in transferring half the endowment of the church to the chapel. To such a transfer, no right, no power is competent, but that which absorbs all power, all right in itself, the englutting authority of conquest †. Two canons of the college now lived in a kind of parsonage-house, at St. Anthony; one of them as half-rector of Gerens, and the other as whole-rector of St. Anthony. But the college being turned into a priory in the beginning of the twelfth century, the parsonage-house became a cell to a couple of monks; one of them, as half-rector, having 46s. 8d. a year, the other, as whole-rector, enjoying 60s. 0d. at the making of the first Valor. Thus did the right sink with the possessions into a lay-fee, at the Reformation*. And at last, probably

† In Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii. 470, is the only case at all parallel with this, yet different from it. "Inveniens in ecclesiâ de Haiâ," says Giraldus Cambrensis, in his account of the archiepiscopal visitation through Wales,—"militem quendam fratrem," the patron probably of the living, "personæ tam oblationes ad altare quàm decimas exte- riores et obventiones omnes cum personâ dimidiantem et ex æquo participantem; statim "enormitatem illam, sed non tamen absque difficultate et militis mulctâ ac comminatione, delevit."

* Leland's Itin. iii. 30: "A celle of S. Antonie longging to Plympton priory; and here, "of late dayes, lay 2 chanons of Plympton priory." P. 43: "Plymtoun a collegiate "chirch, alias capella libera domini regis before the Conquest." P. 45: "William Warwist "bishop bably in the eleventh or twelfth century, certainly before the Valor of the thirteenth, the whole circuit of the heath was taken within the pale of cultivation, and formed into distinct districts for religion, by extending the principle progressively to the west; thus erecting on the only remainder that church, which, in the second Valor, is denominated St. Just's in Roseland, under the valuation of 37*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* but in the first is called only "Ecclesia de Sancto Justo," with the valuation of 4*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; while Eglos-ros is charged at 5*l.* yet recharged at 15*l.* 6*s.* 0½*d.*; and Ruan Lanyhorne, having a parish much smaller than either, is estimated at 5*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* nor rose higher than to 12*l.* afterwards. The primary rate of estimation bespeaks the primary heathiness of the ground within the parish of St. Just; as the secondary denotes the rapid progress made in cultivation there, through two centuries and

"bishop of Excestre, displeased with the chanons or prebendaries of a fre chapelle of the "foundation of the Saxon kinges,—found meanes to dissolve their college, wherin was a deane
 "or provost and 4 prebendaries, with other ministers. Then he set up at Plympton a "priorie of canons-regular." In Henry's Valor, St. Anthony's is said to be only a chapel to Gerens. A gross mistake! In Pope Nicholas's we find, "Ecclesia de Sancto Antonnio "in Rosland l*x*s." equally with "ecclesia de Sancto Gerendo;" and this note to the latter, "Portio rectoris ibidem xlvi*s.* viii*d.* Portio prioris Sancti Antonini in ecclesiâ de
 "Sancto Gerundo, videlicet xlvi*s.* viii*d.*" or (as another, the Harleian, Valor reads)
 "rectoris ecclesiæ Antonii ibidem xlvi*s.* viii*d.*" We thus see the origin of a right, which now appears so singular a secularization of church income, but which is made more singular by the lay-owner's extension of it, not merely to a moiety of the settled permanent income, the tithes and the glebe; but to half of those offerings at Easter, which are purely voluntary in their amount beyond the two-pences, prescribed by law, which, in the two-pences themselves, are purely the fruits of the rector's personal labours in administering the eucharist at Easter, and to half even of the still more contingent fruits of his labours, in burying, in marrying, or in churching. To none of these can the lay-owner have the slightest right, his right being to nothing contingent, to nothing paid for personal offices, to nothing beyond what was substantial enough to be estimated in a Valor. But when the rectorial church of St. Anthony is said, in the second Valor, to be merely a chapel to Gerens, a reference is probably made to its reduced condition under the plundering hands of our reformers; when it was deprived of all its endowments, as well as its house: it now possesses only a petty annuity of 10*l.* a year from its lay-patron, and has divine service once a fortnight only, from the rector or curate of Gerens, as the stationary clergyman nearest to it, one, therefore, sure to be lowest in his terms: so nearly is the little church of St. Anthony brought back to what it seems to have been originally, a mere chapel to Gerens.

a half afterward : a progress much more rapid in St. Just than in Eglos-ros, from the later cultivation of that than of this, and from the building of the town of St. Mawes at one extremity of that. But the position of the two churches of St. Just and of St. Anthony shews us, that the feelings of Gerens and of Eglos-ros had taught the erectors not to select any of the high lands within their districts for the sites of their new churches, but to run down with them into the sheltered bottoms ; both of them being dropt into bottoms more sheltered even than those of the mother-churches, even very narrow, very abrupt, and very wet, where the ground hangs in a steep declivity over the church, but where the church lies, for that very reason, peculiarly snug from the storms.

Thus the church which was the first upon the heath, and so took the heath's name for half of its own, appears from a train of circumstances, some coëval and some subsequent, to have been erected about the middle of the seventh century ; when the memory of St. Piala could not have been fresh enough of itself to provoke a dedication to her ; but when the name of St. Piala was probably attached from some casual reverence for her in the mind of the lay-patron. Denominated Eglos-ros in formal language, down to the first Valor ; it was equally distinguished in familiar all the time, by the name of its saint. Thus only could it have come, as it did come, in two centuries and a half afterward, to have lost its local appellation, and to appear with its saint's name settled in form upon its head, being thus characterized in the last Valor, " Fellye alias Philley," as dedicated to " Saint Felix."

We have also another parish, under a similar title, but much older in its date, one assuredly of our original parishes, and one upon the northern coast of the county, even in the very vicinity of Gwynear. It is called in the second Valor, " Felack, alias St. Felix, alias Phillack," as equally dedicated to " St. Felix ;" even " S. Filake's," by Leland * ; and " S. Feli's" in an old rate for fifteenth^s †. But by the first Valor it is denominated in such a manner, so consonant to all those appella-

* Itin, iii. 18.

† Carew, 90.

tions, and so illustrative of all their meanings; as ascertains the sex, and appropriates the name of the saint, at both churches; “Ecclesia “Sanctæ Felicitatis,” being its appellation there. We thus see the “Sancta Felicitas” of one of the churches, to be the same with the “St. Felix” of both; and the name to have been modified by pronunciation, into “Felack,” or “Fellye,” into “Phillack,” or “Phillee,” or Piala. And the sister of Gwynear appears at last to have settled closer upon the Hayle than he, on the same side of it, but immediately opposite to St. Iä, and in the district comprehending the very castle of Rivier itself †.

BUDOC, however, appears to have pushed farther into the country, even as far as Breaca and Germochus, even to the very brink of the

‡ As rival parishes have contended for the honour of being included within this region of roses and of mutton, just as rival states contended once for the glory of giving birth to Homer; let me, as a fair “arbitrator elegantiarum” between them, here shew upon what grounds I have acted in my determination above. By a rigid sort of self-denying ordinance, I have cut off my own parish, with the parish of Veryan, from that honour for ever. I have thus proved my impartiality at the expense of my ambition. And “this parish of Philley,” says the late Mr. Tonkin, a most unexceptionable witness, “being the first in that tract of “land called Roseland, consisting of four parishes, this, Saint Just, Gerens, and Saint “Anthony; I think,” &c. Upon evidence so weighty, must a cause so important be now settled decisively.

But let me add more gravely, that Tonkin, and Borlase, and Pryce, all unite in giving Rôs the occasional meaning of a valley. Yet this is surely impossible to be true. A word, that in its general acceptance signifies a mountain, can never deviate surely into a meaning directly opposite to that. All language is governed by analogy. Two opposite meanings to a word, therefore, one general but the other occasional, would turn language into confusion, and revive the builders of Babel again. Rhôs (W.) is a mountain meadow; Ross (E.), a promontory; Rhôs, Rôs (C.), a mountain or a meadow, a moss, a heath, or a common; and Rhosydd (C.), heathy ground. Hence the interpreters of the Cornish, losing the predominant idea of a mountain, yet retaining it in part, and combining with it the idea of a meadow; have sunk the mountain into a valley, with a promontory to it, and so have transferred to the valley what can belong to the mountain only. “Ericetum—enim “Ros Britannicè significat,” says that best of all judges, Camden; “unde Rossie in “Scotiâ, et Rossie alteri in Cambriâ, nomen, utpote qui tractus satis siticulosi et aridi, sed “hic,” our Roseland, “colonorum industriâ lætior et feracior. Post hanc Rossiam statim “oceanus,” &c. P. 138.

south

south sea, as the British Channel is with a seeming magnificence of expression denominated in Cornwall. When an appellation has been once fixed upon a grand object, any application of it afterwards to an object much inferior, strikes the mind of the hearer at first with a sense of proud presumption in the applier; till the mind recovers itself from the stroke, rallies its powers of discernment, and sees the sensation to be a revolt merely mechanical in the understanding, against an application strictly just in itself. To the south sea then did Budoc penetrate, and to the south-east, almost as far as Falmouth. "I eam," notes Leland in his progress from east to west along the southern side of Cornwall, "to S. Budocus chirch." This is popularly considered as only a chapel to the church of Gluvias, because it is now united, as it equally appears united upon the second Valor, in one presentation and one institution with Gluvias. But it is witnessed by the first Valor, to have been a distinct church then; "Ecclesia de Sancto Budoco," being then noticed, as well as "Ecclesia de Sancto Gluviate," and that being rated at six pounds, while this is rated only at forty shillings. Yet the one was pretty plainly a chapel to the other, as they are both subjected immediately to the jurisdiction of the bishop. St. Budoc's, indeed, appears, from its superior value, two thirds more than Gluvias's, to have been the mother-church; Gluvias being merely a chapel, erected on the eastern side of a creek, for the conveniency of the new town arising there. It is now thrown out of the town; because the park, belonging to the bishop, on the hill above, was laid open to the builder, and the houses removed to another creek on the west, with a long prominence of land at the side, as well as a greater depth of water in the channel. There the new town began under the years 1264, 1265, "in a more," at the head of this creek, with a collegiate church, founded there by a bishop himself, even bishop Brunscomb, alias the Good Bishop, "in the bottom of a parke of hys;" the park still subsisting to the erection of the church, and the founder of this being therefore the opener of that. Accordingly Norden speaks thus of "Gluvias," as "the church" "for Penrin borowe, yet but a chappell appendant unto Budock, called "Capella de Behelland,—because it was buylded upon certayne lands “ called Behelland feyldes *.” Nor could Gluvias have ever pretended to arrogate a supremacy over Budoc, till the town of Penryn became considerable enough, as it appears in the Valor of 1292; so vigorously had it shot up in less than thirty years! to be a distinct rectory of itself, even to become the denominator of that petty deanery of peculiars, which, however, specifies Budoc first, Gluvias second, then Milor, Gerens, and St. Anthony; till both were reduced into vicarages, by being appropriated to the new college, that germ of the new town; and till both, for this very reason probably, were again incorporated into one, as they appear in the second Valor, under that combined title, which shews us the daughter for the first time presuming to take precedence of her mother, “ St. Gluvias and St. Budoke vicarage.” Then, upon the same principle of religion, another chapel was erected in the removed town, continued to the days of Leland, but has been allowed to disappear since; that attention to the public offices of religion, which operated so strongly before the Reformation, and does so much honour to our ancestors before it, having been shamefully relaxed since, suffering our chapels to be desecrated, and leaving our churches to be deserted. St. Budoc’s then was the mother-church to Penryn, as it is well known to have also been to Falmouth. Yet who was the saint that lent his name to this original parish of Cornwall, and has the honour of enclosing two of our principal towns within it? Leland shall tell us. “ This Budocus,” he adds, “ was an IRISCHMAN, and CAM INTO CORNEWALLE, and THER,” at Budoc, “ DWELLID,” as a hermit †.
" called

Yet

* Norden, 45.

† Leland’s Itin. iii. 25. In the first Valor is this entry: “ Decanatus de Penryn. Eccl. de S^{to} Budoco vi. li.; eccl. de S^{to} Gluviatē xls.” Leland’s Itin. iii. 26: “ The first creke or arme, that eastith outh on the north-west side of Falemuth, goith up [to] Perin, and at the ende it brekith into 2 armes, the lesse to the college of Glasenith—at Perin, the other to St. Gluvias, the paroch chirch of Penrine thereby.” P. 27: “ One Walter Good, bishop of Excestre,” meaning him who is commonly called Walter Broneseomb, who became bishop in 1257, and died in 1280, “ made yn a more—, in the bottom of a parke of his at Penrine, a collegiate chirch.” Itin. Wi de Worcestre, 123: “ Fundacio collegii predicti per Walterum episcopum Excestrie in anno Christi 1265.” Ibid. 128: “ 1264, Peryn villa—. Ecclesia collegii—fundata fuit per Walterum de Goode episcopum Excestriae.” Leland’s Itin. vii. 120:

Yet BURNES went another way, equally penetrated towards the south sea, but inclined much more to the west; and while Sinnin settled near the Land's End, she settled a little short of his abode, at the place so distinguished afterwards by Athelstan's vow, so honoured with a college of clergy erected by Athelstan, so dignified still by that existing remnant of

"At the very hedd of which [creek] standeth a prety towne of marchandyse, and vytayle market. "Yn the towne ys a chapel, and a quarter of a myle owt of the town ys the paroch chyrch." This, adds Mr. Willis, in ii. 106, 107, "is an aneient manor belonging to the see of Exeter, of which it is at this day held by the corporation, who pay the bishops of that see a certain quit-rent for the toll of the markets and the fairs. The bishop is lord of the borough, and forrens or out-borough." In the 30th Edward I. "Thomas Button alias Britton," who became bishop in that very year, 1293, "exhibited his claim of infang-thef," &c. "in his manor of Penryn, which he challenged to be a free borough, and," of course, "to have the property of a market and fair; and that these rights were enjoyed by his predecessors," bishop Quivil and bishop Bronescomb; "who probably made it a borough, there being several presidents [precedents] of bishops having done the same, as Josceline bishop of Wells, who made Cherd, com. Somerset, a free borough, temp. Hen. III." Bishop Bronescomb made it a borough, and bishop Quivil a free borough, assuredly; and thus exercised the power which was not peculiar to prelates, but common to all lords of manors or towns, and belonged to prelates only as such lords. A free borough was merely a borough free from the payment of tolls to its lord. And Walter built the college as a kind of castle to his new town, it being "strongly [strongly] wallid and incastellid, having 3 strong towers, and gunnes, at the but of the creke." (Leland's Itin. iii. 27.) For that reason alone could he have placed his college upon ground so improper for any building, so peculiarly improper for a large one (see W. de Woreestre, 128, 129); upon a "glasenith 1. viridis nidus, or wag mier" (Leland, iii. 26); because this was "at the but ende of the creke." There the college remained in part to the present century, its towers being the "two watch-towers" of Penryn, in Hals, 145, "still in being;" therefore, leading him to say Penryn "was heretofore walled and fortified for its defence against enemies;" one of them occasioning Willis to allege more truly, in ii. 106, that "part of the ruins of this [college] are still standing, viz. a tower and some garden walls;" and all traces of it being now swept away, except the two stone piers of a large gateway, opening into the town. The bishop's house, which had this park for an appertenance, is noticed by Norden, 49, as "without the towne,—a mannor," house, "called Penryn e Bryn;" or the Court of Penryn (see Rowland's Mona, 90, 91); and by Hals, 145, as in English Summer Court Town, merely Summer Court, a small house on the creek coming from the college, and very lately rebuilt for a manufactory of paper.

In Hals's bedlamite account of Penryn, 144—147, we have some verses cited from "the Cornish Manuscript of the Creation of the World, a play brought into Oxford in 1450, "and of the college, a nominal deanery, a real jurisdiction, and a large revenue. "S. Buriana," Leland tells us, "AN HOLY WOMAN OF IRELAND, sumtyne dwellid in this place, and there made an oratory *." "The canons of Saint Berrione," as Doomsday Book informs us, "hold Eglos-berrie †." So varied does the name appear, in the two mentions made of it by this record! But it appears still more varied in the Valors, the earlier specifying "Ecclesia de Beranes," according to the Cottonian copy, or "Ecclesia Sanctæ Berianæ," according to Spelman's; and the later mentioning "Borian, alias St. Burien." Yet with another variation, disguising her name, I believe her to be the same with "Bruinet [Burient], a king's daughter, that came into Cornwall with SAINT PIRAN ‡." And she even appears plainly to be "Saint Branca [Buranta], the virgin, who lies in the church of the female saint aforesaid, four miles from Mount St. Michael §." The college "and still extant in the Bodleian library there;" which he did not understand, and I now wish to apply. Some of them are these, as translated by himself:

"Warbarth gans ol gweel Bohellan,	"Your wages is [are] prepared,
"Hag goad Penrin entien,	"Together with all the fields of Bohellan,
"An Ennis, hag Arwinick,	"And the wood of Penrin entirely,
"Tregimber, hag Kegyllack.	"The island, and Arwinick,
	"Tregimber, and Kegyllack."

The words, notes Hals, are "spoken as by Solomon rewarding the builders of the universe." So finely are all the unities of time, place, and character observed by this Cornish drama. The fields of Bohellan allude to the very lands, on which Gluvias church was built; the wood of Penryn, to the wood traditionally known to have been formerly there in its imparked state: Ennys, not to the island of the Black Rock, as Hals most ridiculously supposes, a rock never inhabited; and never habitable; but to an estate still denominated Ennys, as well as to estates equally denominated still Arwinick, Tregimber, and Kegyllack: all with Behelland within the parish of Gluvias, and all witnessing the author himself to have been a parishioner of it. Bacon cites Willis, for St. Mary Magdalen chapel, in Penryn, when Willis only cites Leland, and for a chapel without a name.

* Leland's Itin. iii.

† F. 121: "Canonici S. Berrione tenent Eglos-berrie." In Cornish it was called "Eglos Buriens, i. e. Ecclesia Buriensæ vel Berianæ" (Camden, 136); as Barien is to this day pronounced Berien in common conversation.

‡ Leland's Itin. iii. 195: "Ex Vita Pirani.—Bruinet, filia cujusdam reguli."

§ Itin. W. de Worcestre, 107: "Sancta Branca, virgo; dies ejus agitur die primo . . . , jacet in ecclesiâ prædictæ Sanctæ per iii milia Montis Michaelis."

of clergy, erected in honour of this saint, seems to have been deserted by them for some time before the Reformation; from the preposterous nomination probably of Englishmen, of court chaplains, or of ministerial expectants, to the preferments in it. They were there at the Conquest. They probably continued there for a good while afterward. But they were seldom resident at all in the days of Leland; and therefore called aloud for the compelling hand of discipline to be laid upon them. "Ther lyith betwyxt the sowth-west and Newlyn," says this ever useful chorographer, "a myle or more of the se, S. Buryens, a sanctuary; wherby, as nere to the chyrch, be not above viii dwellyng howses. Ther longeth to S. Buryens a deane and a few prebendarys, that almost be nether ther *." The college thus sunk into ruins, and the ruins were destroyed by that retrograde zeal for religion, which should in common sense have rebuilt instead of demolishing the college, and have settled a permanent colony of divines within it. There were three prebendaries, a rector, and a dean; the three probably for the three churches of Burien, Sennan, and Lexin, the rector for the ruling church, and the dean, as president over all. But now the dean,

Like Aaron's rod, has swallow'd up the rest;

having first fattened his lean deanery of 9*l.* 10*s.* 0*½d.* in the last Valor, with the rich rectory of the parish, instituted some ages before either Athelstan or the dean, and in the last Valor rated at 48*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*; but having also glutted himself since, I apprehend, with two of the three prebends. These are specified in the Valor under the titles of Tirthney, Respernell, or Parva, and with the estimates of 7*l.*, 7*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, or 2*l.* respectively. Two of these, however, Respernell and Tirthney, exist merely in name, having been for a century past incorporated silently into the substance of the deanery, and having therefore no known patron at present; while the other, the very small one, has the bishop for its. Thus clergymen shew a rapaciousness of avarice, even in sacred appropriations of income, that a sacrilegious Henry did not shew. What he spared, they seize. And a parish, so large in itself, so amply beneficed at first, so richly collegiated afterwards, is resigned up to the care of three curates; while the rector, the dean, and two out of the three prebendaries, are all living luxuriously in the person of one divine, the very leviathan of St. Burien's, but taking his pastime at a considerable distance from it*. The "oratory," then, which "S. Buriana—there made, while she sumtyme dwellid in this place" as a hermit, was of the same sort as Breaca made upon another point of our shore, the parish-church rebuilt by her; rebuilt at the expense of one, who, though she was a hermit like Breaca, was also like her possessed of much wealth, and was in fact the daughter of a king; becoming afterwards the place of her sepulture, so bearing her sainted name upon its head, and receiving the supplications of Athelstan to God in it; but finally taken down by the king, when he "made ex voto "a college where the oratory was," and where the still collegiated yet shamefully deserted parish-church is at present†.

* Leland's Itin. vii. 127.

Thus did the Cornish come to be, what Camden represents them to have been in his time; "men who have always respected so far the saints of Ireland, and those of their own country, as the tutelary spirits of it, that they have consecrated almost all their towns to them‡." But let me bind these three incidents close to my subject, by a fourth. In the year 600, according to Harding, or 586, according to Powel, says Dr. Borlase in his Chronology, "Caricis, alias Careticus, reigned, according to H. 3, to P. 2, years over all Britain, and in Wales, and in Cornwall 15 more. At this time the Britons were, by the Saxons,—driven into Wales and Cornwall with their king Careticus." Not in Powel's Catalogue §. This is that visionary kind of history, which still haunts the scene of reality at times, "revisiting the glimpses of the moon," and "making night hideous." A sole sovereign over all Britain about the year 600, or even 586, and driven from his imperial throne into Wales or Cornwall, is merely a ghost, drest in armour of gilt leather, gliding along the darkened boards, and vanishing. Care-

* Tanner, Borlase, 383, 384, and Bacon.

† Leland's Hin. iii. 18.

‡ Camden, 136: "Sanctos—Hibernicos, et indigetes suos, hæc gens ut tutelares ita semper suspexit, ut omnia fere oppida illis consecraverit."

§ Borlase, 409.

ticus indeed was only the little king of a county, had no connexion with Cornwall at all, and ruled only what has derived its appellation from him, Ceredica, or Cardiganshire in Wales*. Nor did he or his son CARANTOC live so late as 586 or 600; the son passing over into Ireland about 432, in order to unite with Saint Patrick in the glorious work of converting the Irish†; and afterwards, about 460, coming assuredly into Cornwall with the large colony of hermits from Ireland, some of them, like him, the companions of St. Patrick; some too, like him, the very co-operators with St. Patrick in converting the Irish. Into Cornwall he certainly came; and therefore came with that colony of co-operators or companions, which has proved so very copious a source of saints to the Cornish. “Karantoc was the son of Cericus, “a king of the Britons,” says an ancient life of him, in some extracts made by Leland; “Karantoc constructed an oratory for himself, in the “place which was called Guerith Karantauc‡.” This the biographer afterwards denominates in a mode of termination, that may seem to speak him a Saxon, but is equally British also; “Karanton, that is, the “manour of Karantoc, being the place given to Karantoc§.” The name of Guerith Karantauc, therefore, thus explained by the biographer as a Cornishman, is that Cornish appellation which was fixed upon the ground, at the very period of ceding the ground to Karantoc; and the appellation is truly correspondent with all. Gwerydoe (W.) signifying a land, a country, a region; but Gueret (C.), which is still nearer to the name, meaning the ground. This land must have been assigned to the

* Usher, 441: “Carantocum—Keredici Cericæ apud Cambrobr. annos regis filium.”

† Usher, 441: “Eodem ipso quo in Hiberniam Patricius advenit anno, Carantocum, “Hibernis Cernach appellatum,—in Hiberniâ conversari cepisse, in Sancti illius Vitâ “legimus.”—See also p. 517, for the specified year.

‡ Leland’s Itin. iii. 195: “Ex Vitâ Karantoci. ‘Karant. filius Keretici regis Britann.’;” an ambiguous expression, that probably suggested the wild imagination of a king of all Britain. “Karant. construxit oratorium in loco qui dictus Guerith Karantauc.” This saint, therefore, is different from the Karatoc, or Carantac, of Itin. viii. 72: “Ex Vitâ Karantoci. “‘Carantacus filius Roderici regis. Carantocus fuit in Hiberniâ 30 annis ante nativitatem S. “Danielis’,” which Daniel died about 545. (Usher, 274.)

§ Leland’s Itin. iii. 195: “Ex Vitâ Karantoci.—Karanton, i. e. villa Karantoci, locus “datus Karant.”

dignified hermit, by the owner of the soil under the permission of the king. Both, therefore, must have been as much Christians in profession, as Carantoc was one in zeal. This zeal, which carried him into Ireland, and engaged him with the heathens, which exposed him to infinite dangers, as well as subjected him to infinite troubles, strangely subsided at last into the sequestrations of a hermitage. We consider indeed the religiousness that thus retires, to be mingled with timidity, to shrink therefore from the world, and so to withdraw into solitude; when with more courage it would be more useful, and, by giving an example of practised holiness, would delineate to all viewers, mediate or immediate, the very picture of general religiousness in lively colours. Nor do we consider wrong, in thus thinking. This is clearly the case, with the multitude of retirers. But with such men as Carantoc, as Piran, and others before, men that felt enough of the impulse of spirit, to meet the blackest frowns of the world; that kindled sufficiently with the flame of Heaven, to struggle earnestly for the salvation of man in contradiction to man's own desires; the case is very different. Such men had, such men could have, no timidity about them. They were the magnanimous heroes of our race. They shewed themselves such in magnanimous and heroical exertions for the conversion of man to Christianity. But when the work was done, for which their spirits had been strained, and their minds bent, to their fullest stretch of possibility; their minds and spirits relaxed, seeking a repose from all their intense-ness of operation, in the calm of contemplative religion, in the ease of devout aspirations. In this manner, but with less dignity, Scipio retired from the triumphs of war and the ingratitude of Rome, to walk with Lælius upon the beach at Caieta or Lorenzo, to pick pebbles, to collect shells, and let himself down to all the amusements of his boyish days*. That therefore may be said of them which Livy writes of him; "in

* Tully De Oratore, ii. 22: "Sæpe ex socero meo audiui, cum is diceret, socerum suum
 " Lælium semper ferè cum Scipione solitum rusticari, eo-que incredibiliter repuerascere esse
 " solitos, cum rus ex urbe, tanquam e vinculis, evolavissent. Non audeo dicere de talibus
 " viris, sed tamen ita solet narrare Scævola, conchas eos et umbilicos ad Caietam et ad
 " Laurentum legere consuesse, et ad omnem animi remissionem ludamque descendere."

“ youth they were continually engaged in wars, in old age they seemed “ to shrink in their size, because they had not objects sufficient to call “ out their genius †.” On this principle did Carantoc settle at a point of our north sea, a little to the east of Piran; fix his cell by the parish-church there, and was buried within it at his death, assuredly; so gave his name to a parish, that surrounds the site of both at present, that once had the collegiate church of Saint Karentine upon the very site of his, and still has the poor, plundered, naked church of Carantok, or Crantok. That church has been collegiate in honour of St. Carantoc, we may be sure very soon after his death, and while his memory was yet fresh among the Cornish. It is therefore mentioned in our record of Domesday Book, as even then a college of canons. These “ canons “ of S. Carentoch,” says the book, “ hold Langoroch;” a name then applied to the church and church-lands, by a colloquial contraction of the saint’s name, as it is still retained for the church itself, “ and held it “ in the time of king Edward *.” They appear, from the early Valor, to have been no less than nine prebendaries and a portionist ‡. But all were torn away before the late Valor, by that low-thoughted penuriousness of soul, which fancies almost every expense too much for the honour of God’s worship, but none too great for the gratification of its own pride; which plunders the church of God to swell the luxury of its own table; and would, if it could, plunder even “ Heaven’s pavement, beaten “ gold,” to heighten its own pomp of prodigality upon earth. Thus a church so amply endowed, as to be rated in value beyond any other in Cornwall, even at 89*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.* near two thousand a year at present, has been reduced so low by the audaciousness of sacrilege, as to remain a melancholy monument of its ravages in the eyes of the present generation. Nothing is left, not even the vicarage, that production of lazi-

† Livy, xxxviii. 53: “ In juventû bella assidue gesta; cum senectû res quoque defloriêre, “ nec præbita est materia ingenio.”

* Domesday Book, f. 121: “ Canonici S. Carentoch tenent Langoroch, et tenebant “ tempore regis Edwardi.” Hals, 73: “ The vicarage church of Crantock is commonly “ called Lau-Gurra, or Lan-Gorra.”

‡ Pope Nicholas’s Valor, by supplying from Spelman’s copy the portion omitted in the Cottonian.

ness, or non-residence, in the canoins, rated in the first Valor at forty shillings merely, but turned in the second into a curacy, that subsists merely on a pittance of eight pounds a-year certain*. So nearly have some of the clergy been ground to atoms in their revenues, between the moving millstones of Popery and Protestantism; both turning upon the same spindle of selfishness, but Protestantism pressing with still greater force than Popery. So little, too, could the character of this sainted son of a Welsh king, this honoured hermit of Cornwall, and this converter of the Irish with St. Patrick, operate to save his church, the erection, probably, of some cotemporary sovereign of Cornwall, from the sousing harpies of desolation†!

* Bacon.

† Cotemporary with these was a saint, purely Cornish in his birth, I apprehend, but never yet affixed to Cornwall. This is one of whom our memorials are not very slight, and our evidences not merely modern. “Whilst S. Patrick laboured in the Gospell with so great “successe,” says Cressy, 182-185, “Brittany,” that is, our isle of Britain, “was illustrated “with the glory of another great saint; who, notwithstanding, by reason of the calamities “afterward hapning, was forced to leave his native cuntry, and passe over into Armorica “in Gaule: this was S. WINWALOC, the son of a certain noble person called Fracan, cou- “sin-german to a British prince named Coton, as wee reade in the Gallican Martyrologe. “Malbranc, a French antiquary, affirms that his mother’s name was Alba, and surname “Trimavis, citing for his authority the ancient manuscript monuments of Monstreuil.— “Malbranc earnestly contends that his sacred relics repose at Monstreuil, where they shew “likewise his chasuble, albe, and stole; and there is a church dedicated to his memory, “in French called S. Waloy.” This saint was professedly a British, and plainly a Cornish man. He is remembered at Monstreuil, we see, and he is equally remembered in Corn- wall, we know: a church has continued his name in both to the present day. In our deanery of Kerrier we have the parish of Gunwullo, and the church of it is dedicated to Saint Wynwallow. This part of our coast, therefore, was assuredly that at which he resided as a hermit, and from which he “passed over into Armorica,” to settle finally at a monastery in Artois; while the church of S. Waloy, at Monstreuil, was in all probabi- lity that “little private church, seperated from noyse and abode of people, about a mile “distant from his monastery,” to which “it was S. Winwaloc’s custom to repair daily,— “that he might more quietly and without distraction” pray there. (Cressy, 184.) He was half a hermit still; but he is now restored to Cornwall for the first time. Yet to Cornwall was he given by the old martyrologies, the additions made to Bede’s specifying expressly on the twenty-eighth of April “CORNUBLÆ nat. S. GUINGUALØI Confessoris.” (Bede’s Opera, 362.) He was no martyr, we see, as he was only a confessor; and his natale was his actual birth-day.

I have

I have thus carried my chain of evidence to a sufficient length for the present; I have particularly pointed out that rich embarkation of saints which came over from Ireland into Cornwall about the year 460. All these saints existed, we should now remember, in that very period of our Cornish history in which Dr. Borlase dreams he “finds many holy “men employed to convert the Cornish to the Christian religion;” when the Cornish appear already converted, already Christians, and having their kings, their nobles, their clergy, their monks, or their hermits, all happily united in Christianity together*.

SECTION

* In that colony from Ireland came undoubtedly some who are not to be regularly traced up to it at present, and therefore cannot be positively incorporated into its catalogue. Such a one we find in Leland’s brief notice of “WITHEL, an Yrisc saint” (Itin. v. 42), who certainly gave name to the “Ecclesia de Withiel” of the first Valor; the “Wythioll, alias “Withiel,” of the second, a parish in our deanery of Pyder; because the name is pronounced by the Cornish exactly as it is written by Leland, not Wythioll or Withiel, but Withel. This church, therefore, is not dedicated in reality, however it may be in report, to an unknown “St. Uvell,” whose name has little or no correspondency of sound with the appellation of the parish, but to this saint of Ireland, who echoes the name of the parish with so just a tone in his own. We have also another parish, that I suppose to be equally denominatèd from one of these Irish saints. “The prior of Tywardreth,” says Hals, 11, “with divers other benefactors, as appears from the carving and inscription on the stones “thereof, founded and endowed this church within the town of Trenance, now ST. AUSTELL “town; after which it was indifferently written Trenance Prior (Carew’s Survey of Corn- “wall, 47), that is to say, the Valley-town Prior (or pertaining to him); and again by “him, Trenance Aus-tell, i. e. the Cell, Chapel, or Hole Valley-town; and again, Tre- “nance Aus-tell, i. e. the Valley-town, or out remote Cell or Chapel, so called in respect “to Tywardreth, its superior or mother-church.” With such a sweep of licentiousness does this hero in absurdity take his course! even when he seems, from his references, to be most authentic in his accounts, he contrives to dash his folly of fiction in the face of his reader. The etymologies are too contemptible for refutation, and the reference to Carew is absolutely false in itself. Carew, in f. 47, makes no mention at all of “Trenance Prior,” mentioning only “Trenanste” for Trenan Austle; as in f. 44, he mentions equally under the 3d of Henry IV. “Trenasanstel” for Trenans Austel. The township was originally called Trenance, and in it resided the denominating saint. “S. Austol,” notes Leland in Itin. vii. 120, “erat heremita.” He took up his residence not far from a fountain here, called to this day “St. Austell Well,” though it is a quarter of a mile to the north of the town, being a hollow in the face of a high perpendicular rock, bellying wide within, and arched in a peak without. The very place is denominatèd from it Manacuddle in writing,

SECTION II.

I HAVE now raised my lighthouse, stone by stone, and story by story, till the top of it has nearly ascended to the period of St. German's visit into Cornwall. But as I have some operations for St. German to perform in Cornwall that are purely Christian in themselves, and imply Christianity to be the religion established in Cornwall at the time, I am compelled to raise my lighthouse still higher. Thus will the fire upon it form a larger sphere of illumination, and irradiate the darkest clouds about its head; we shall thus behold Christianity, at the coming of Germanus into Cornwall, before it, even long before, dissolving all the magic ties of druidism, bursting all the charmed bands of heathen ignorance or heathen viciousness, and setting the soul of our ancestors free, free to assert her native dignity, to aspire after her natural place of rest, to fly into the bosom of her Father and her Friend in heaven.

Though Melor was not a martyr for Christianity, yet he was (as I have already hinted) a Christian when he was murdered. He was, says his ancient biographer in Leland, "bred up in a monastery*," that or Menikettle in pronunciation; a Cornish appellation, that signifies merely the belly or basin in the rock (see Hist. of Man. ii. 285, quarto), and a basin attracting always the attention of antiquaries, recently engaging from them the title of a baptistery, yet now appropriated, for the first time, to its own use and its own saint: his cell, however, seems to have been on the site of the town itself, to have been there modelled into a chapel after his death, and magnified into a parish-church at last; thus proving the origin of the town, and having a district taken for it out of the close-adjoining parish of St. Mewan assuredly. A parish-church it was, even in the days of the first Valor; being specified in it as "ecclesia de Sancto Austolo," at the very time when it had been appropriated to the priory of Tywardreth, as it had then "vicarius ejusdem." It was so appropriated in the reign of Henry III.: "Cart. 33 Ed. 1. n. 38. recit. per inspeximus tres cartas Hen. 3. viz. pri-

"mam," &c. "secundam de ecclesiâ de Austel, tertiam de libertate sanctuarii S. Austeli."
(Monasticon, ii. 586, 587, Tanner under Tywardraith.)

* Leland's Itin. iii. 194, 195: "Ex Vitâ S. Melori.—'Melorus emtritus in cœnobio'."

indubitable evidence of Christianity professed and established in the country. We have even the very name of the monastery in that of its president, and so come to know the chronology of another saint of Cornwall: he was “bred up in the monastery of SAINT CORENTIN †.” This saint, as Dr. Borlase tells us, “who is now called Cury,” a chapel being now denominated from him Corantyn in the Valor of Henry VIII.; but Cury in popular usage, omitted (like Germo) in the Valor of Pope Nicholas, and, like Germo, included then, as it now is, in the parish of Breague, but included in it as a chapel to Gunwallo, a member still of the extended body of Breague, though all Sithney interposes between them, and once therefore uniting with Sithney to compose that body, “was the first Cornish apostle of note that we know of. Born in Brit“tany, he preached first in his own country and Ireland, till, being “driven away by violence, he again betook himself to the life of a “hermit, which he had quitted for the sake of travelling [in Brittany “and Ireland], to instruct the ignorant [in Brittany] and the infidel [in “Ireland]: he settled at the foot of a mountain called Menchont, in “the diocese of Cornwall.” A note refers to Parker’s Ecclesiastical Antiquities for what is called “the very rich rectory of Menihont, in “Devonshire*,” without remarking that in Devonshire there is no such rectory, and even no such vicarage. “But some think it Men-“hynnett, in Cornwall;” as the note, without any apparent consciousness of the higher rationality of its second suggestion, immediately sub-joins. “Here the fame of his sanctity increasing, at the entreaty of “Grallonus king of the Armoricans, he was consecrated bishop of “Cornwall by St. Martin, bishop of Tours in France, and, being said “to have converted all Cornwall, died in the year 401 ‡.” This account is wholly derived from those impure sources of intelligence, Capgrave and Tinmouth; but the Doctor refers all to a source still more impure—to his own authority, as he appeals to no testimony for it. Nor is it worth while to dwell upon the apparent absurdities in it; he who

† Leland’s Itin. iii. 194, 195: “Ex Vitâ S. Melori.—‘In cœnobio S. Corentini’.”

* Borlase, 369: “‘Uberrimam rectoriam de Manihont in Devonîâ.’ Parker’s Eccl. Ant. Drake, p. 381.”

‡ Borlase, 369.

“again betook himself to the life of a hermit,” being consecrated a bishop, and he being consecrated bishop of Cornwall, “at the entreaty of”—whom?—the king of Cornwall surely!—No!—“of Grallonus king of the Armoricans.” Only let me observe, that the second of these absurdities is apparently generated by a mixture of conflicting atoms: Grallon king of the Armoricans, at whose solicitation Corantyn was consecrated bishop of Cornwall, being actually king or count of Cornouaille in Armorica*; and Corantyn, so consecrated bishop of Cornwall, being bishop of Cornouaille in fact, even lending his sainted name to the cathedral of Cornouaille at Quimper†. We must however take the history as it lies before us, because we have no other, and try to pick up gold with Virgil out of this dung of Ennius. Corantyn, then, who is said by Dr. Borlase to have “died in the year 401,” certainly died in a much earlier year; as Melor, who was murdered soon after the first reception of Christianity in Cornwall, we know to have been educated in his monastery. He first settled as a hermit, probably upon the shore of our south sea, upon that part of it in the parish of Breague which has the chapel of Corantyn or Cury on it at present: from his hermitage here, he seems to have been drawn by the king of Cornwall, and to have taken the charge of that monastery, as it was called, or that academy, as it might more properly be called, in which Melor the son of the king was educated. This was the retirement, I presume, in which he is here said to have “settled at the foot of a mountain called Menehont ;” at the foot of the mountain, high on the side of which stands the church, and at the bottom of which lies the vicarage-house:

* Lobineau, i. 1.

† “La legende de S. Menulfe ou Menon, que l'on trouve dans la Bibliotheque du P. Labbe, tome ii, dans les Bollandistes au tome iii. du mois de Juillet, rapporte que ce saint personnage quittant la Grande-Bretagne, aborda au territoire des Osisuriens, ou S. Chorentin étoit eveque; ‘pervenit ad Minorem (Britanniam), in provinciam civitatis quæ ab antiquis Oximorum nuncupatur, cujus Sanctus Chorentinus antistes erat.’” (D’Anville’s Notice de l’Ancienne Gaule, 509.) “Des lettres datées de l’an 1166—ont été données ‘apud Confluentiam in ecclesiâ B. Mariæ et B. Chorentini.’ On lit dans un autre titre du Cartulaire de Kinper, ‘ecclesia S. Chorentini in Confluentiâ.’” (Ibid. 248, 249.)

the former, like a church in Wales, had attracted to it the name of Llan Heneth, or the Church of the Elder; so lent the name of Men Heneth, or the Mountain of the Elder, to the hill on which it stands*; and thence extended it over the parish, in supersedence of the ancient appellation of Tregelly †. This accordingly bears still the name of Manihinnnet in the Valor of Pope Nicholas, and of Mynhenyote, alias Mennhynnet, in that of Henry VIII.; and the vicarage, once the parsonage, I suppose, was that early academy or monastery of the Britons before the very first of all those schools of Cornwall, which have continued in our parsonage or our vicarage houses, even as late as our own days. This is also the church so distinguished in modern times, by being the first which heard the liturgy in the English language; as that is the mountain so celebrated in ancient, by having the first known school for education under it. We thus see Christianity established so thoroughly in Cornwall at this period, whatever the period precisely is, and soon after the general acceptance of Christianity by the Britons, that an academy was erected for the Christian education of the nobles, as even the son of the king was educated in it. We thus too advance, by the scale of Dr. Borlase's own chronology, up beyond the year 401, when Corantyn is stated by him to have died, and nearly half a century beyond the year at which St. German made his visit into Cornwall. And to this account of Corentin, however full for a person so little known, we may just add two circumstances totally unknown to Dr. Borlase, yet truly important to the history of him; that he is mentioned expressly

* Mynneu or Mennit, are mountains in Welsh and Cornish (Borlase); Myn or Men, therefore, was once a mountain in those languages, as Moin, Muine, still are in Irish, and Penmanmaur is in Welsh; Heneth (C.) is age, Henydd (W.) an elder. So we have "Llan Heneth," a parish-church in Wales, not signifying (as Leland interprets the name) "Fanum Obedientiæ" (Itin. v. 62), but "Fanum Presbyteri." This is now called "Henllan," I presume, in "the deanery of Rhose or Ross." (Liber Regis.)

† "The lordship of [Treg]elly, now caullid Minheneth lordship—: from Leskard to Minheneth a 2 miles, wher is a fair large old chirch. The personage is impropriate to," Exeter college in Oxford. "The maner of Minheneth was sumtime caullid Tregelly, whereof the name and ruines yet remaine." (Leland's Itin. iii. 39, 40.) The ruins still remain, I understand, in a gateway, &c.

upon the additions made to Bede's Martyrology in manuscript, as there we read on the first of May thus, "in Cornwall, the birth-day of SAINT " CONRINTIN, the confessor and bishop *;" and that this saint was so famous in those ages during which religion seems not merely (as it ought) to have reigned paramount to all other ideas, but almost to have absorbed them quite, as to have made the abbey of Glastonbury proud to possess the relics of "SAINT CORENTIN the bishop †," equally with the remains of St. Petrock and other less provincial saints ‡.

But we may mount still higher upon Dr. Borlase's ladder, and actually advance another half century beyond this: so sleepily inattentive has the Doctor been to the very facts and dates which he furnishes himself! The mind of a writer, unless it is very lively in its energies, and kept awake by perpetual exertions, is apt to doze at times over its work; to perform half the functions of authorship under the influence of drowsiness, so produce a composition

. Got " 'tween asleep and wake."

* Bedæ Opera, 364, Smith: "Cornubiæ natale S. Conrintini confessoris atque pontificis."

† Joannes Glastoniensis, 450: "Os de Sancto Corentino episcopo," with "os de Sancto Petroco," &c.

‡ See Borlase's Nat. Hist. 315, for the English liturgy being first used in Menhynnet. But what must have been the religious distress of the Cornish in the long interval between the proscription of the ancient liturgy, and the establishment of the new in the English language? The English, too, was not desired by the Cornish, as vulgar history says, and as Dr. Borlase avers (ibid.); but, as the case shews itself plainly to be, forced upon the Cornish by the tyranny of England, at a time when the English language was yet unknown in Cornwall. This act of tyranny was at once gross barbarity to the Cornish people, and a death-blow to the Cornish language. Had the liturgy been translated into Cornish, as it was into Welsh, that language would have been equally preserved with this to the present moment. But this Wales in a corner had not consequence enough in itself to secure it that proper attention of humanity and of religion, equally with the extensive principality of North and South Wales; for savage indeed are those rulers who, for the sake of a petty advantage in politics, sentence a whole generation of men to live without the benefit of public worship; as was in our own days meditated equally to be done, according to the late Dr. Johnson's information personally given to me, against the Scotch of the Highlands, by low wretches who could not lift up their souls above the suffocating vapour of politics.

"About

“ About the middle of the fourth century,” the Doctor observes, “ Solomon mon duke of Cornwall,” or, as in his chronology at the end he cites Leland, more properly calling him “ the little king of Cornwall* ;” though the Doctor still persists in calling him duke, even there, as if he thought the nominal king to be a real duke † ; “ seems to have been “ a Christian ; for his son KEBIUS was ordained a bishop by Hilarius, “ bishop of Poitiers in France, and afterwards returned into his own “ country to exercise that high function ‡ .” The prior Keby, therefore, and not the posterior Corantyn, was surely what we have already seen, the Doctor most contradictorily calling the latter “ the first Cornish “ apostle of note that we meet with ;” the former being actually the first in time, the first in birth as a certainly “ Cornish apostle,” and the first too in “ note” as the son of the king of Cornwall ; nor could “ Solomon duke of Cornwall” even “ seem to have been a Christian,” but must have been no Christian at all, if the posterior Corantyn has been truly “ said” before “ to have converted all Cornwall.” Yet Solomon, the father of Keby, in fact does not merely “ seem” to be a Christian, but was certainly one, as his scriptural name of Solomon evinces at a glance. So early was Christianity seated on the throne of Cornwall ; even by Dr. Borlase’s own estimation of time, “ about the “ middle of the fourth century,” as the Doctor here avers, or “ about “ the year 350,” as the Doctor repeats in another place § . Keby himself, according to his biographers Tinnmouth and Capgrave in Usher, to whom the Doctor refers for his and their account, first spent twenty years in his education among his countrymen of Cornwall || ; being educated, like Melor, in some Cornish monastery assuredly, and most probably in what was afterward Corantyn’s at Menhynnet. Such a monastery was at once a school and an university to the members, they being

* Leland De Script. Brit. 65 : “ Solomonis, Coriniæ reguli.”

† Borlase, 407.

‡ Ibid. ibid.

§ Ibid. ibid.

|| Usher, 105 : “ ‘ Postquam viginti annis apud Cornubienses suos liberalibus disciplinis “ incubuisset,” &c.

sent to it very young, and therefore spending so many years at it. He then went abroad to complete his education, and to prepare himself more eminently for the office to which he obviously devoted his life at this period—that of a clergyman; nor had he any conception of that hasty mode of preparing for the sacred character, of which we see such frequent instances in his own Cornwall at present, and by which the raw schoolboy is speedily transformed into the unfledged divine. A Cornish education too might properly qualify, he thought, for the secular affairs of life, or even for the ordinary duties of the clerical function; but his mind aspired to higher learning, and his soul affected a nobler excellence. He went into France, and repaired to Poitiers, says Leland in his useful gleanings from some ancient life of him, as “a city very famous for the number of its professors, over which did then preside Hilary the bishop, that ornament truly great to divines*.” Here, as Leland adds, “he laid himself out in every sort of attention to the bishop, in order to procure his good opinion; at last obtained from him that ordination on which his soul was so strongly bent; and was even in proper time afterwards consecrated bishop by him †.” His episcopal powers he exercised probably as a suffragan to Hilary in his diocese of Poitou; and continued with Hilary, I suppose, shewing all the reverence of a pupil to his tutor, and expressing all the piety of a son to a father, till even the health of a Hilary yielded to the siege of time, and old age terminated the long life of the prelate. Keby spent no less than fifty years with him, if we can believe his two biographers, Tinmouth and Capgrave, on a point so very extravagant in itself §. Keby must certainly have staid there many years; nor would any event, in all probability, have torn him away from Hilary after so long a continuance together; except the very demise of Hilary. Then the principal attraction to Poitiers being removed from the heart, every object there reminding him strongly of Hilary, and a shade of mournful recollection being thus thrown continually over his thoughts; he cast his eyes back upon his native shore, and returned into his father's kingdom of Cornwall *. He came not however to challenge that royalty in it, of which his father had been possessed in his life, and to which he himself had a right to succeed on his father's death; having undoubtedly resigned up his right to his brother's family, when he went abroad, when he devoted himself to a studious life, when he dedicated his days to the work of the ministry †; and so escaping all that long train of miseries, which Meluan, with Melor, suffered from it.

* Leland De Script. Brit. 65: “Galliam—petiit, et Pictonum invisit urbem, numero doctorum celeberrimam; cui tum præfuit Hilarius pontifex, theologorum decus planè eximium.”

† Leland, ibid. “Gratiam antistitis modis omnibus sibi comparare satagebat; tandem, quod voluit maximè, impetravit; idque tanto cum successu, ut episcopus ab eo designaretur.”

§ Usher, 105: “Apud quem [Hilarium Pictavorum episcopum], Kebium Britannum—, per quinquaginta annos mansisse, graduque episcopali ab eo accepto,” &c.

The chronology of this period, indeed, is confessedly very obscure; but we do not use the lights that we have. Let us then bring them forward, and apply them to the history, for the first time. When Capgrave fixes the murder of Melor "at the very commencement of the "Christian faith accepted by the Britons ‡," he plainly refers it to the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, in the empire at large, and in this island as a part of the whole. He refers it therefore to the first fifty or sixty years after that establishment, so fixing it between the years 313—370. Within this period were those councils held, at which the bishops of Britain were present; that of Arles in 314, that of Nice in 325, that of Sardica in 347, and that of Rimini in 359 §. But in 358, Hilary bishop of Poitiers, then banished into Phrygia for his attachment to rectitude of faith, in his adherence to the doctrine of our Saviour's godhead; addressed a public letter to his brother-bishops of the continent and of the isle, expressing his joy to hear "they were

* Usher, 105: "In patriam suam postea remeâsse, referunt in ejus Vitâ Johannes Tinmuthensis et Capgravius."

† Leland De Script. Brit. 65: "Majori literarum quàm opum paternarum studio tenebatur."

‡ Usher, 241: "In ipsis Christianæ fidei à Britannis acceptæ primordiis."

§ Usher, 511.

" uncontaminated

“ uncontaminated and unhurt, by any contagion from a detestable heresy†.” Keby is also represented by Tinnmouth and by Capgrave to have left Poitou and returned into Cornwall in 364 §. And Hilary, who had been sent into banishment in 356, but was recalled from it in 360 or 361, died at Poitiers in 368 or 369 ||. All these dates nearly coincide together. The adventures of Keby unite in general time, with the murders of Melor and Melyan. Keby probably resigned up the crown on the death of his father Solomon, to his younger brother Melyan; staid not at Poitiers probably half the years assigned for his stay, such writers as Capgrave and Tinnmouth measuring the lives of their saints, by an antediluvian scale of years; went therefore to Poitiers about 350, while his father was yet reigning, and when Hilary was made bishop †; acted as a substitute for Hilary probably, during his exile of four years from his diocese; so came back into Cornwall, in 368 or 369 probably. He came back, says Dr. Borlase from his authorities, “ to exercise that high function of a bishop, with which he was invested.” He came primarily to see his royal relations; yet not to retire from them into the solitude of a hermitage afterwards, as he had not retired into any before; but under the protection of their head to settle in a town, as he had settled at Poitiers before, and there to act under the Cornish prelate, as he had acted under the Poitevin, in the capacity of a suffragan. For these reasons, it seems, he settled about the middle of the long diocese, and at the town of TREGONEY, then not what it now is, a mere kind of village, without trade, without industry, without money, but a town of the first consequence in the county, a town of great commerce, a town of much shipping, a town of considerable extent, and as such, having two churches successively erected within it before this period.

† Usher, 105: “ Incontaminatos vos et illæsos ab omni contagio detestandæ hæreseos.”

§ Usher, 512.

|| Cave’s Historia Literaria, i. 164, 165, edit. 1738.

† Cave’s Hist. Lit. 164: “ Pictavorum episcopus esse constitutus, circa annum ex Baronii calculo ccclv, nullâ tamen eogente ratione, quin annis aliquot ante id tempus ad sedem Pictavensem evehi potuerit.”

Tregoney was the very first town upon any branch of that fine harbour, which forms the principal pride of Cornwall; which excels all the harbours of the isle, except Milford Haven, for security of anchorage, for expanse of water, and for number of openings into it; which therefore lies like a vast Briareus, stretching forth its gigantic carcass on every side, and throwing out its hundred arms into the land around it. Tregoney was upon the main arm, even the denominating river; was denominated Cenia itself, while the harbour was called the Mouth of the Cenia; and the southern road of the Romans in Cornwall terminated at this Cenia, now Tre-Geney, or Tre-Goney, more properly that than this, as it is popularly entitled Treg'ney, the Castle upon the Cenia, now the Fal†. Tregoney was thus a town at a time, when Falmouth town, when Penryn, when even Truro itself, was not yet in contemplation for many ages; held possession of the river Fal with its harbour at the mouth, when it had and could have no rival; and so stood the original lord, the natural sovereign of all. Tregoney, indeed, is now deserted by the tide of its harbour, and almost even by the waters of its river. Yet that it once had the full, free, absolute enjoyment of both, is evident from a train of concurring evidences. Its river, the equal denominator of it and of the harbour among the Romans, is much more considerable in itself than the currents either of Truro or of Penryn; and therefore carries its name over them all even to this day, as they unite to fall into the sea together. But then, as ranging over a larger extent of ground, as particularly traversing the moors of St. Stephen's, St. Dennis, or St. Roche; it lay much nearer than they to the stream-works, and was much more exposed to injuries from them. Such it must have received very early, stream-works being the first mines of a country for metal, as they were for gold on the Doria of Great St. Bernard formerly‡; and an ancient stream-work for tin being actually found about nineteen years ago, in St. James's Moor, at Tregoney, close to the current of the † Richard, 20: "Urbes habebant [Damnonii]—Ceniam," &c. "fluvii apud ipsos præcipui—Cenius," &c. P. 40, Iter xvi. "Tamara, m. p. Voluba, m. p. "Cenia, m. p." Ptolemy also, in ii. 3, notes the Mouth of the Cenia, Κενιωτος ποταμος εκβολη.

‡ Course of Hannibal over the Alps, ii. 183, &c.

Fal, even under the very walls of the original churchyard of Tregoney there. And the mischief produced by these injuries of ages, has continued down to our own times in despite of two laws against it; is surveyed by the neighbouring gentry with an improvident sort of serenity, that foresees not the ruin of the very harbour itself in time; yet is strongly marked to the eye of historic curiosity, by a succession of the sea's recedings from Tregoney*.

“The main streame,” of Falmouth harbour, cries Leland, “goith up —ebbing and flowing, and a quarter of a mile above is the toune of Tregoney. Here is a bridge of stone, aliquot arcuum, upon Fala river †.” Leland thus shews the spring-tide in his time to have reached within a quarter of a mile from Tregoney; while it comes not

* Statute 23. c. 8. of Henry VIII. “Piteously complaineth,” as from “the inhabitants of the towns and ports of Plymouth, Dartmouth, and Teingmouth, in the county of Devonshire, Falmouth and Foway, in the county of Cornwall, that where the said ports have been in time past the principal and most commodious havens and ports within this realm, for the rode, surety, and preservation of ships resorting from all places of the world, as well in peril of storms as otherwise; for where, before this time, all manner of ships being under the portage of eight hundred tons resorting unto any of the said ports or havens, might at the low-water easily enter into the same, and there lie in surety, what wind or tempest soever did blow—; which said ports and havens been at this present time utterly decayed and destroyed by means of certain tin-works called streamworks—; that, where before this time, a ship of the portage of eight hundred tun, as is aforesaid, might have easily entred at a low water into the same; now a ship of a hundred can scantly enter at the half flood, to the decay and utter destruction of the said havens and ports, and also to the ruine and utter undoing of all the good townes—;” it therefore enacts a penalty on all persons who shall work or cause to be worked any stream-works, “nigh to any of the said fresh waters, rivers, or low places, descending or having course unto the said havens or ports, or any of them,” of “forfeit for every such time that any owner or tinner shall dig or wash, or cause to be digged or washed, any tin, contrary to the form aforesaid, x li.” This act was confirmed by another in the 27th year of the same king, c. 23: “Because,” says this second statute, “with the making of the said [first] statute, the inhabitants of the said port-towns or havens, having little regard, respect, love, or affection to the amending and maintenance of the same towns and havens,—have permitted—the said owners and diggers to persevere—, without any manner of suit commenced or pursued;” it doubles the penalty.

† Itin. iii. 28.

within a mile and a half at present. But we can trace this retreat of the tide to a higher period than Leland's. Tregoney, he says in another place, "is at the olde ful se marke ‡." A tradition, so loud as to engage the notice of a passing traveller, yet so sure as to leave no doubt upon his mind, and lend no diffidence to his pen; told him, that the sea not long before had risen much higher than within a quarter of a mile from Tregoney, and even reached up to the very bridge of Tregoney itself. But we can carry the flowing tide still higher up the channel. "Formerly," says Hals, who wrote about 1716, "the sea ebbd and flowed above Tregny bridge and St. James's chapel, as the shells and sand there still to be seen, and tradition, inform us §." The trumpet of tradition, we see, was still sounded in the ears of Hals; and his eyes confirmed the suggestions of his ears. He marked the shells of the sea, lying in the channel of the river, and bedded in their native sand. Nor need we to stop here. "Belowe Probus churchc," says Norden, and should more properly have said, below Golden in Probus parish, but upon the opposite bank of the Fal, "is a rock, called Hayle-boate Roche, wherein to this day," about 1584, "are many" and "great IRON RYNGES, whercunto BOATES HAVE BENE TYED; now noe show of a haven *." "This is," adds Mr. Tonkin, in 1733—1735, "a great rock of a sort of dun stone, at the head of a pretty large level, full of stream-work; which probably, together with them higher up in the river, have choaked up the passage of the sea. There are no rings of iron at present, nor the signs, nor places of any. One may, however, judge from the situation and face of the country, that the sea came up here †." Norden's testimony indeed is so clear, particular, and peremptory; that there is no rational possibility of doubting it. The rock too is a double one, a higher and a lower; two or three round holes (whatever Mr. Tonkin may allege) still existing in the lower, for the insertion of the rings, and two of them being close together, for the two fangs of a forked ring. The ground below is all a marsh up to the Fal, which is about two hundred yards off, and along both sides of a brook, that parts the parishes of Cuby and of Creed, Cuby as now written,

‡ Itin. vii. 129.

§ Hals, 80.

* Norden, 61, 62.

† Tonkin's MS.

but Keby as formerly written and now pronounced; the rock being on the Keby side, at the very extremity of the parish, and with its face to the brook. At this rock, said "the common tradition," in the days of Mr. Tonkin, said equally in the days of Norden, and so says still, were the boats fastened which plied upon the river, when the tide came up it to this place. This was so notorious an occurrence in itself, and the rock was so notoriously known to be the mooring-station for boats; that the very estate on which it lies, then and within these very few years all an uncultivated common, but now a range of enclosures, bearing grass or corn, adopted the appellation which it still retains, of Hål-boat, or the Boat-moor; and that the rock itself equally took the appellation, which it equally retains, of *Hål-bot-rock. The ground lies directly opposite to Golden mill, is continually occupied with it, but extends across the lane leading up to the church of Creed, and is vulgarly denominated the Halberts, for Halboats, at present. All these testimonies combine into one, and produce a collective kind of evidence, that fastens in a full conviction upon the mind. The Fal was navigated from its mouth up to Creed parish, by the commercial vessels of Tregoney; and the haven of Tregoney is still marked out, to the inquisitive mind. About a quarter of a mile from Tregoney to the south-west, in the lane leading to the church-town of Ruan Lanyhorne, and close upon the channel of the river, is a building of brick, divided into two houses, carrying a modern aspect with it, but bearing the significant appellation of "Daddy Port." This name significantly indicates by its meaning that primary port of Tregoney, which the river was sure to form for it below the bridge; Tad (W.), Tat (A.), Tud (C.), and Daid (I.), importing the same exactly as daddy itself imports in colloquial English at present, and pointing out this part of the river as the parent port of Tregoney. About a mile more to the south-west, in the same lane, but considerably within the parish of Ruan Lanyhorne, is a range of fields denominated Bosawna, the Bos Haun (C.), or the Haven-house, haven being constantly pronounced hann by the Cornish, and

* Nor are these names what they may seem to be, purely English; Hål (C.) being a moor, Båd (W.), Bad (I.), a boat, and Rok (A.) a rock.

Gorran Haven, styled Gorran Haun by them. About a mile still lower down in the channel, beyond the creek that runs up between two parallel ramparts of hills, to water the narrow bottom in which stands Lanyhorne castle in ruins, with the parsonage-house flourishing in peace at its side, and the church rearing its head immediately over the latter; is a house called Devora or Ar Devra Veor, standing at the northern extremity of a peninsula, and on the southern foot of a round headland denominated Minit, Mynydd (W.), Menit (C.), a mountain, and lending its name to the field. This mountain unites with that peninsula, to project directly across the channel, seeming to bar all farther descent to the stream, and actually forming a basin most commodiously barred from almost all winds. These have also a house at the head of a creek just beyond them, denominated Ardevora, or more relatively Ardevora Vean, the Little, in opposition to the Great before; both the names being in Cornish Ar Devra, and importing the houses upon the haven. Nor let ignorance triumph in supposition at hearing these derivations, fancy another etymologist would fabricate another derivation, and so smile at the impotence of reasoning in producing etymons for arguments. Ignorance, like blindness, is very apt to apprehend pitfalls in the plainest ground, and in its conceitedness of fear, to prevent all possibility of conviction. But Leland himself speaks in this very manner, of both these houses: "Pctite's principal house " was at Ardeueravian," Ardevora Vean, "IN FALMOUTH HAVEN, by " the peninsula caullid Ardeverameur," Ardevora Veor †. And, to close the evidence at once, Leland adds in another place what carries the haven of Falmouth up to Tregoney itself; "from Tregoney to passe " doune by the body of THE HAVEN OF FALAMUTH, to the mouth of " Lanyhorne creeke, on the south-est side of THE HAVEN, is a 2 miles ‡." So apparently was the river from Tregoney to Ruan Lanyhorne and to Ardevora Veor, or Vean, even all the way to the mouth; considered even in the late days of Leland, as the haven to the seaport town of Tregoney. The vessels that went to sea, lay along these reaches of the river by Daddy-port, or by Bosawna down to Ardevora Veor, and lay securely moored in this land-locked haven of theirs. The tall banks of the river on either side, point out the natural boundaries of the tide to this day, the breadth of its current, and the depth of its waters. And all this range of water is equally considered at present, even as low as Trefusis Point, to be within the port of Truro; Truro having risen upon Tregoney, as Falmouth has risen upon Truro since. But Tregoney had also, like London at present, another haven above the bridge; and, like it, for boats alone. These were employed, I suppose, in bringing up the cargoes from the vessels below, to the warehouses on the quay; and in transporting them higher up the stream, for sale. Those employed in the former work, would naturally be moored on the opposite bank of the river; and only such, as were engaged in the latter, be moored at the rock above. These, however, must have been very numerous, to give so significant a name to the rock and its common. But at Golden mill, opposite to it, and therefore perhaps claiming it still as a port of itself, was, what we now call in our pedantic affectation of French terms, a great depôt, a grand station for the landing and reception of wares, the highest that the merchants of Tregoney had up the river. The numerous boats belonging to this, were drawn up the brook at high water, were moored fast to the rock, and so lay out of the course of the navigation, or the current of the tide*.

† Itin. iii. 20.

‡ Itin. iii. 28.

* Mr. Tonkin observes at Hal-bot-rock, that “the sea came up here, and much higher, “according to the common tradition.” But, upon this last particular, the voice of tradition speaks so faintly in its tone, and so loosely in its language, using only a vague generality of expression, and specifying no one point higher; that we cannot rest upon its testimony. Yet Charles Trevanion, esquire, of Crega, in Keby parish, procured an act of parliament in the 19th of Charles II. for executing a plan that he had formed in consequence of the tradition probably, and carrying the tide again “much higher” up, even “as far as Crowe hill in Saint Stephen’s.” But he never carried it so high as that, never as high as Hal-bot-rock, and only a little beyond the bridge of Tregoney. His “first summer’s work” seemed to favour his design, bringing the salt-water by two or three sluices above Tregoney bridge.” But the floods of the following winter swept away his sluices, the walls having been built upon the mud, that had descended from the stream-works, and beaten back the tide. He therefore began again, and again encountered the same fate. He still renewed his efforts, however, “with greater skill, cost, and labour.” He thus went on “for ab ut “the space of twenty years.” At last with sorrow and compassion we find, that he “hath “spent the greatest part of his fine estate; and given over his undertaking, as too difficult “and unprofitable an enterprise.” (Hals, 81.)

In this happy position of the town for commerce, however, it began as a town from a principle much earlier in its impression upon the mind of man, than commerce. The military sagacity of the Romans, ever on the watch to secure the naturally defensible passes of a conquered country, saw the sloping side of Tregoney hill terminate in a prominence, with a high precipice on each side, and a brook uniting with the Fal under it. On this prominence they fixed one of their castles, which, like most of them, was rebuilt in a more modern form afterwards, of which the trenches were discovered in the rock on the north-west, about nineteen years ago, and the mount in the middle still remains, as what it is denominated, the green hill, to the present day; fixing here the last link in their chain of military communications on the south, because here undoubtedly was then the lowest ford over the Fal, and this current swept in one grand curve of deep waters before them to the sea. But, though military ideas predominated with the Romans, ideas of civilization always accompanied them, subservient indeed, yet still operative. A town constantly arose by the side of their castle. Here it arose on the level below the northern precipice of the castle, and along the banks of the Fal; as here was the inviting position for a town, and here the church of the town stood for ages afterward. Leland thus notices the town in his time, as one “ wher yn is an old castel, and a paroch chyrch of S. James standing yn a more by the castel†.” This is that church, to which the minister of Tregoney is even now instituted by the title of St. James’s; as St. James’s festival is also the annual fair-day of the town. That church indeed has been deserted since the days of Leland; only an angle of it has remained within the reach of memory; even this was thrown down about nineteen years ago, in a search for tin, and, among the graves that the searchers opened, only one of them had an appearance of a coffin in it. The first act of civilization in burials would be, to do as our sailors do at present, and as the Jews did to the very last*, to wind up the body in some wrapper, and then deposit it in the earth; coffins coming into general use, I believe, only within these two centuries past†. What attracted the town to this level, must have been the convenience of the river, and the advantage of commerce upon it. The advantage and the convenience accordingly operated so powerfully, that Tregoney grew up to be what tradition loves so fondly to tell it was, old age naturally soothing its present decrepitude with the remembrance of its youthful activities; and what my notices, previous or subsequent, confirm it to have been; a very considerable town. The quay formed an embankment to the river. Behind it ranged the town with its only church. A street of houses also, adds tradition, extended up from the level of that to the high ground east of the castle, and so began the town upon its present position, properly the High Town of Tregoney. Another street went on, as tradition subjoins, winding under the precipice of the castle, crossing the brook at the prominence, but not stretching directly on in the course of the present road to Daddy Port and Bosawna, because this was then within the channel of the tide; turning therefore up the steep hill on the left, and reaching to the present village of Reskivias, an asserted mile in length. What strongly corroborates this tradition, there is another at Reskivias itself, and two more at Ruan Lanyhorne, coinciding closely with it. The first is, that Reskivias, or Reskivay, was certainly a city. The second is, that Trelonk, a farm-house within the parish of Ruan Lanyhorne, ranging in its lands along the creek and the river, was formerly a city inhabited by a king; that this city reached to Reskivias; and that it was denominated the city of Reskivias, or Reskivay. The third is also, that the church-town of Ruan Lanyhorne, which is on the opposite or Tregoney side of the creek from

† Itin. vii. 120. Norden, 64, says: “Tregny—or Tregeny—graced somtymes with “Pomery Casile, the ruynes wherof yet speake, as they lye altogether rent on the topp of a mounte.” Worcester, 95, adds, “Castellum Tregheny stat (pertinet Pomereys) in “Trefeny burgagio [burgo] super le south.”

* Acts of the Apostles, v. 6, 10.

† The first coffin, I apprehend, was what is called a shell now in London; the word being the British cafn of Wales, a trough, a tray, any hollow vessel of wood or stone, as caffnu (W.) is to make hollow, koffen in Cornwall means the hollow of an open mine, as covin in Covinus formerly imported a war-chariot. So coffin at present signifies the hollow of a horse's hoof, of a paper case for groceries, and of a pie or a custard; while in French it means a basket used by tallow-chandlers. The British origin of the word, therefore, shews the Britons to have used shells. These were equally used by the ages since, even till the British coffin was closed at last into a modern one.

Trelonk, was equally a city once; that it equally reached to Reskivias; but that it went thither along the present road to Tregoney, and extended up even to Tregoney itself. These traditions are very remarkable, as they all unite together, and seem to be all substantiated by facts. Reskivias was assuredly a part of Tregoney. Trelonk was certainly a royal house, as its very name indicates; The Long obviously meaning the Long House, and Long House being in Irish the appropriate title of a king's mansion, as in Long Phort; while all the buildings of Trelonk-house are said to have constituted a village within memory, while many foundations of walls have been recently discovered about it, while a piece of ground, overrun with briars or brambles, was found about seventeen years ago to be black earth, four or five feet deep, over a regular pavement; and about forty-two years ago were discovered, what told to vulgar antiquarianism the existence of three smiths' shops, a quantity of cinders, with fragments of iron, at three places. And the church-town has still a triangular recess on the road to Tregoney, but just above its church, which appears to have been once a market-place, because it is denominated The Cross, because it gives the name of the Cross-parks to two fields adjoining, and the boys of the church-town still light their fires of Midsummer eve upon it, as at the ancient market-place of this acknowledged city. The truth is, I believe, that both the church-town and Trelonk became two terminating points to those buildings of Tregoney, which successively ranged from Reskivias to them in pursuit of the shrinking tide; that thus the buildings carried Tregoney up to them, in such a long chord of houses, upon the high grounds of the river on the south, as ended at Trelonk in some foundries for the iron of the vessels navigating along the river.

Yet the town shot out previously up the sloping side of its own hill, from the street noticed above; as a chapel was there erected at what was then the extremity of the High Town, and what is therefore the widest part of the present, the open area a little east of the castle-hill. This is mentioned by Leland thus, as “a chapel standing yn the middes “of the towne*.” It was afterward, when it became no longer necessary as a chapel, converted into a corn-hall; and, when a corn-hall became as unnecessary as a chapel was before, sunk under neglect into ruins, presenting a real heap of rubbish to my eye in 1777. But the opulence of the town, and the extent of its buildings, did not end here. It still pushed up the side of the hill from this chapel, so left it as it was in Leland's time, and as its site is at our own, "yn the myddes of the towne," but fixed another chapel much higher up. This is equally noticed by Leland, as "at the est end of the town," which it also is at present; but is not, what Leland and every one call it, "a paroche chyrche*." It is merely, like the other, a chapel to St. James's church; a chapel for this eastern extremity of the High Town, as the other was for the western. That is thus, as a daughter-chapel, naturally and necessarily attached to this as the mother-church. Both, therefore, are exhibited as one, as the one church of the parish of Tregoney, in the last Valor, thus, "St. James and St. Keby, alias Tregney, alias Tregoney, V.;" St. Keby's being mentioned second, as the daughter, and St. James first, as the mother, yet both as uniting into one parish-church. This church was appropriated to the monastery of De Valle in Normandy at first, but to the priory of Merton in Surrey afterwards, and to what was successively a cell to both, the priory of Tregoney, not evanescent yet from the town, though never recognised by it†. The church was thus deprived of all its great tithes, and has in land (besides the churchyard of St. James's) only what is reputed to be the endowment of St. Keby's, but is in reality the glebe-land of St. James's.

* Leland, vii. 120.

* Leland, vii. 120.

† Tanner. "The priory of Tregoney," there mentioned in 52 II. III. just existed opposite to the old mount of the castle, and shewed a door-case of stone, peaked in the arch, but has been very recently destroyed. Yet another doorway remains, almost opposite to the site of this, but less apparent, as less in sight, being plainly the front gate of the priory transferred to a stable, and, equally with the door-case above, shewing an arch of stone, a little peaked. This is, however, much larger than that was in the size of the arch, as that was only the doorway of the chapel; a niche being found in the wall there, and again built up in an opposite wall, for the reception of a small statue. In 1267, "the advowson" of this priory belonged to the abbey De Valle; but "this priory, with the advowsons of the churches of Tregoney and Biry [Bury Pomery in Devonshire], were made over to the priory of Merton that very year."

And the first Valor demonstrates all this to be true; not noticing the church and parish of St. Keby at all, speaking only of “the church of Tregoney” as “worth cvis. viiijd.” and of “the vicarage of the same” as “worth *xxs. .” The whole parish of St. Keby then, as now reputed, is merely that of Tregoney in origin at first and in existence at present; seemingly separated from the parish of the town, by the burgensic privileges of the latter, and by the exclusiveness which these actually give it. The very church of St. Keby too, as equally reputed, is merely a chapel to St. James’s church, used accordingly by Tregoney as its own and its parish’s church, now that the tide has deserted the town, and commerce has removed after it; now that the original town and original church have resigned up the ground which they occupied, to revert into its natural state of a moor again; now that the long street from it to Reskivias, and the longer from Reskivias to Ruan Lanyhorne, have vanished with the palaces of an eastern tale; now that the other street, from the moor to the first chapel, has equally vanished, together with this chapel itself; and now that Tregoney stands, like some nobleman, reduced by a revolution to abject poverty, reduced equally in feelings as in finances, even stooping therefore to live upon the basket of alms handed to it by its parliamentary representatives.

Yet how came this last chapel, so exalted into a church in opinion, and so remaining in fact the only church of Tregoney parish at present, to bear the name of SAINT KEY? In the most flourishing state of the town, I suppose, the saint settled at it. He settled not, however, at the original, the commercial part of the town. He had no concern with commerce. He settled at the eastern extremity of the whole, at that raised eminence on the hill side, which looked down upon all the rest, and which gave him at once the conveniences of a town with the sequestration of the country. He dwelt upon that very ground, I believe, which stands almost directly across the street of Tregoney, which accordingly obliges the road out of the street to bend upon one side for avoiding it, and is now the very site of the church itself. Here he lived with so much sanctity of spirit, so much dignity of mind, and so much devoutness of aspect, I suppose, that his house, like St. Mawe's, was rebuilt into a chapel upon his death, a chapel now buried almost in the human mould accumulated about it, having the walk through its cemetery sunk very deep between rows of sepulchres on each side, having yet a couple of steps from the walk down into it; carrying, therefore, uncommon features of antiquity in this marking circumstance of its aspect, and being the only chapel that now bears his name popularly for its own through the whole extent of Cornwall. So usefully stands this chapel of St. Keby at present; to speak the large extent to which the tide of prosperity once flowed at Tregoney; to tell the early period at which it reached its highest point there; and to shew Christianity successively producing at it a church upon the bank of the river, a chapel upon the high ground behind, with a second chapel at the eastern extremity of the whole, and the very last at or about the conclusion of the fourth century*.

* “Eccl. Tregony” (Cotton MS.), “Eccl. de Tregoni” (Spelman’s), “Vicar ejusdem” (Spelman’s).

But, thus settled as St. Keby was at this principal town in Cornwall, he left Cornwall again so hastily, that Leland does not notice his return into it. He went away again in a few months after he returned; as his stay seems to have formed an interval in his life too minute for the naked eye of history in Leland, and only visible to the microscope of a saint's biography in Tinmouth or Capgrave: yet the fact is, that Leland overlooked what Capgrave or Tinmouth saw. The episcopal character in which Keby came into Cornwall, and the episcopal authority which Keby exercised in Cornwall, Leland transferred to a country in which Keby never assumed that, and never exercised this, merely by throwing his eye of history at a glance beyond the intermediate region of Cornwall. For that reason he represents Keby to have gone from Hilary and Poitiers immediately to North-Wales and Anglesey; sent thither as a bishop by Hilary, even consecrated a bishop by him in order to be so sent*. But the representation is equally absurd in its manner, and false in its matter. It is certainly a splendid absurdity to suppose that a bishop of Poitou should send another bishop as a missionary—into North-Wales and Anglesey, regions replenished equally with Christians, and governed equally by a bishop as Poitou itself: it suppresses too the whole fact of Keby's return into Cornwall; but it equally suppresses the still more marked fact, which I shall soon notice, of Keby's migration out of Cornwall to St. David's and to Ireland.

* See note near the end of this section. This church consists of two parts, one original and the other posterior; the posterior is the southern aisle, but the original is the northern, with the Lord's chapel projecting from it to the north.

There must have been some extraordinary incident to produce such a violent change in the conduct of Keby: to drive away a saint, a bishop, from this land of his father, this kingdom of his brother, to which he had returned after so long an absence, and to throw him into a strange country, an uncertain habitation, even the new life of a hermit. Such an incident we actually find in that dreadful revolution, by which all the bonds of nature were torn asunder; ambition murdered the sovereign of Cornwall, though a brother-in-law; and savageness first maimed, then murdered, a nephew. The sight, the hearing, or the apprehension of such enormities, might well carry the religious Keby in an instant out of the country. He went off, leaving such a strong impression of his goodness upon the minds of his countrymen, from his resignation of a crown and a palace for a life of studiousness, sequestration, and prayer, as occasioned them to enrol him on his death among the native saints of Cornwall †.

* Leland De Script. Brit. 65: "Ut episcopus ab eo designaretur; hâc interim injunctâ "provinciâ, ut Venetos," the inhabitants of Venedotia, or North-Wales; "et Monadas," the natives of Mona or Anglesey; "gentes Cambriæ versus boream patriæ [Britanniæ] "redditas, exemplis et sanâ informaret doctrinâ."

† The inhabitants of Tregoney keep his festival even at the present moment. This is unknown, indeed, to the very inhabitants themselves, who suppose they are keeping the feast of the adjoining chapel of Cornelly, in the parish of Probus, because Cornelly has its feast upon the same day, the first Sunday after Michaelmas. But the feast is pointed out to be St. Keby's by the concurrence of the parish of Kea, the church of which is dedicated to the saint of Tregoney, in the observance of the Tregoney day. "St. Key," notes Norden, 57, "—in recordes St. Keby."

In the want probably of a vessel bound immediately for that Ireland which was not yet converted to the Christian faith †, he shipped himself hastily, I suppose, on board one that was bound for Pembroke-shire, in order to remove from the bloody breach in nature, made, or likely to be made by that prodigy of profligacy, Rivold. He reached St. David's; he reached Ireland. He went to the latter, probably that his soul might not be shocked again with the enormities of nominal Christians; of men whom, from their enormities, Dr. Borlase would have readily pronounced to be heathens, if they had been of Cornwall instead of Devonshire, and to be actuated with all the persisting spirit of druidism. Yet the saint took refuge from these enormities, not in the abodes of infidelity, where the viciousness of the human soul was sure to swell into worse than the crimes of such Christians, as acting with the same violence, and feeling a feebler restraint; but in solitude and devoutness, in seclusion from the mass of mankind, and in attention to the continual though unseen presence of his God. He therefore penetrated, not into the country, but settled merely upon an islet on the coast, built himself a church, and continued four years*. At the end of these, he removed from Ireland, apprehensive, probably, of some visits from the infidels of the main land; yet went not back into Cornwall, which was still governed by the usurping murderer probably, but went into that Anglesey, to which Leland dispatches him at once‡. Even then he came not to be the bishop of the isle, much less to be the bishop of it and of North-Wales together: he came only as he went to Ireland, as a hermit, accompanied by a small society of hermits; nor did he ever, in all appearance, set his foot upon one inch of ground without the isle. He crossed over from Ireland; he landed at that promontory which now is, which two hundred and fifty years ago was, the very point of passage

† Usher, 512, 513.

* Ibid. 411: "in patriam reversum Meneviam concessisse, et inde trans-fretantem in Hiberniam, in quâdam insulâ, constructâ ecclesiâ, annis quatuor mansisse,—refert in illius Vita Johannes Timotheensis."

‡ Leland De Script. Brit. 65, and Usher, 411: "Demum, cum discipulis suis inde recedentem, in insulâ Mona sive Angleseâ consedisce, refert," &c.

out of Ireland into Britain †: there he settled at once upon the islet forming the most westerly part of Anglesey, and under Holyhead the most westerly part of the islet. There, adds Leland very usefully, “he fixed his abode, and a humble one at first;” being merely a cottage, I suppose. “But the little king of the isle,” a Christian and a friend to Christians, “in pity to the poorness of it, liberally presented him with a castle, which stood in the very vicinity. In consequence of this donation, a small monastery was formed within the castle, which was afterwards called from his name Caer Keby,” or Keby’s Castle. “At this time,” subjoins Leland concerning his own days, it has canons or prebendaries in it, and exerts a pleasing hospitality to persons passing over into Ireland §. Here he settled, and here he died; from the reverence paid to him here, as at Tregoney before, lending his name after his death to the church, lending it also to the village near the church, still attaching the name of Holy Head to this point of land, and even fixing the name of his preceptor or his friend Hilary upon another point of the islet*.

Such

† Leland De Script. Brit. 65, and Camden, 541.

§ Leland, ibid.: “Humilem principio posuit sedem. Regulus insulæ, ejus misertus tenuitatis, castrum, quod in ipsâ erat extensione, dono liberalis dedit. Unde et ibidem erectum monasteriolum; quo, ab ejus postea nomine, Castrum Chebii appellatum est. Hâc ætate canonicos alit præbendarios, gratum in Hiberniam transfretantibus hospitium præbens.”

* Camden, 541: “In extremo—ad occasum promontorio, quod nos Holy-head, id est, Caput Sacrum, vocamus, adsidet tennis viculus Britannicè Caer Guby; cui Kibius, vir sanctissimus, Sancti Hilarii Pictavensis discipulus, qui ibidem Deo vacavit, nomen fecit.” Usher, 49: “Caer-Guby—in Monæ sive Anglesciæ promontorio quod Sacrum Angli vocant, ubi Kebius, ab Hilario Pictavensi (a quo et alterum ejusdem insulæ Hilary Poynt nomen accepit promontorium) episcopali gradu accepto, consedisse traditur.” Rowlands, 144, intimates that this Hilary has been mistaken by many in the biography of Keby for the bishop of Poitiers, but actually stands for a similarly denominated saint of Wales; and Mr. Gough has been weak enough, in ii. 572, to repeat the suggestion. With the unthinking, authority is the Brazilian eel itself to rest upon, which is to attract the electrical stroke of torpor, and to feel its influence benumbing all the faculties: Mr. Gough has thus rested upon Dr. Borlase before, and is now come to rest thus upon Rowlands. The Welsh saint is called by Rowlands, “our St. Elian, surnamed Cannaid, i. e. the Bright, by Latin “writers

Such was Keby, the son of Solomon king of Cornwall, and born about the year 325*, about the time probably when his father was baptized an adult into the Christian religion, under the adopted appellation of Solomon; revered in Cornwall, revered in Wales, and worthy of all reverence throughout the Christian world †.

We

“writers called Hilarius, who—hath been often mistaken by many for St. Hilary bishop of Poitiers;” and Mr. Gough repeats the impertinence, yet in this half-dubious form: “pupil to Hilary bishop of Poitiers,—or of Elian Ganniad, or the Bright, in Latin Hilarius, “who has still resort at Llan Elian.” But, as Ganniad or Cannaid signifies merely white or shining, and therefore could never correspond with Hilarius; so no ancient writer in Latin calls Elian Hilarius, and no ancient writer in British denominates Hilarius Elian. “By our British writers,” says also the late republisher of Rowlands’s work, correcting the text in a note concerning Elian, “he is called Elian,” not Cannaid, but “Ceimiad.” The surmise of Elian being Hilarius indeed, was taken up originally without any reference to the accompanying Ceimiad, or Cannaid, and was then reprobated at once by Leland; he briefly commenting upon the Welsh appellation of “Llan Elian” thus, “Ælianus, falso “Hilarius.” (Coll. iv. 88.) The fancy, therefore, seems to have been adopted in a mere temerity of supposing Hilarius of Poitiers to be the Ælianus of Wales; and the adjunct of Ceimiad to the name of Ælianus, seems to have been latterly altered into Cannaid, in order to support the temerity; nor could either Mr. Gough or Rowlands have thought one moment in this attempted transmutation of names. To shew this decisively, I need only repeat Leland’s account of Keby’s going to Hilary, and afterwards settling in Anglesey: “Galliam ergo petiit, et Pictonum inivit urbem, numero doctorum celeberrimam; cui tum præfuit Hilarius pontifex, theologorum decus planè eximium. Chebius—tandem—impe- “travit,—ut episcopus ab eo designaretur.— Deinde et in Monam trajecit insulam.”

* Usher, 512, fixes the migration of Keby to St. David’s and Ireland in 364, and his settlement upon the isle of Anglesey in 369. But, as I have already shewn Hilary to have become bishop of Poitiers about 350, and to have died bishop about 368 or 369, Keby must have returned into Cornwall about 369, have migrated to Ireland about 370, and have settled in Anglesey about 374.

† “We have a tradition even to this day,” notes the republisher of Rowlands’s work, 144, “about this Cybi, that he used to meet St. Seiriol weekly, at a place called Clorach, near “Lanerehmedd, where there are two wells still bearing their names.” But, as Mr. Gough tells us concerning the village of Holyhead, “near the extremity of the village stands the “church, in which St. Kebi—founded a small monastery,” or, as the author meant to say, to which belonged a small monastery founded by St. Kebi. “His monastery was succeeded “by a college of presbyters,” the canonici prebendarii of Leland, “founded by one of the “lords of Anglesea in the beginning of the 12th century,” and dissolved soon after Leland wrote his account of it. “The church is built in form of a cross: on the pediment of the

We thus reach the topmost round of our chronological ladder: but we reach it not before we have ascended with Christianity in our hands, “north transept is Sancte Kyb. ora pro nobis.” This shews the church to have been dedicated to him, as it still is, and as the original church therefore was. But why was Keby’s little monastery called Caer Guby? Leland has enabled me in my text to answer very clearly a question that naturally arises to every mind, and has never been asked or answered before; even the relics of Leland’s castle remain unsuspected to the present day. “The “wall of the church-yard,” says Mr. Gough, all unconscious of the castle while he is describing it, “are solidly built of stone disposed herring-bone fashion, entered by an ancient “stone-gate, with a round tower at the north-east corners next the sea:—it is a square of “220 feet by 130; the walls on three sides 17 feet high and 6 thick; the masonry of the “whole evidently Roman: along the walls are two rows of round holes, four inches in diameter, hollowed through like those at Segontium, and merely plastered over.” The last part of this extract is professedly derived from Mr. Pennant, “ii. 277,” but is really derived from ii. 287, 288, has copied him too closely in one point, and has missed his meaning in two others. Mr. Pennant’s reference to Segontium is just and proper, but Mr. Gough’s is really ridiculous: the former describing those holes in the walls of Segontium, to which he assimilates these at Caer Guby, in ii. 229; but Mr. Gough never describing those holes at all in ii. 556, yet keeping up the assimilation in ii. 572. Mr. Gough also says, the holes are “hollowed through” the walls; but Mr. Pennant tells us, that there are some “which “pass through the whole thickness,” and others “which are discovered in the end of the “wall, and seem to run through it lengthways” (ii. 229); and the former holes, which Mr. Gough with a careless trowel has “merely plastered over,” and so shut them up seemingly from the eye in their original condition, Mr. Pennant has “nicely plastered within.” To this collection of the straws and feathers that float continually on the common stream of writings, let me add, that the church, now a donative, was thus registered in the Valor of Henry VIII.: “Ecclesia collegiat. de Castro Cubii.” So plainly did the name of Castle continue to the period of the Valor! even as plainly as the remains of the castle are observable to the present moment. But “two rocks, with ruins of little oratories” on them, “opposite to the church, have the names of Ynis Gybi and Ynis Rug,” of Keby and one of his brother-hermits, who here lived insulated at times from the petty continent of the monastery. Yet even here has antiquarian folly, that rankest perhaps of all follies merely literary, fixed the see of the bishop of Anglesey, of North Wales, or of both (Usher, 49); and so turned the mere hermit, however social, yet still a hermit, into the prelate of a diocese. Only more absurd can be what Mr. Gough relates with great gravity, and without the most distant reprobation; that “Baxter,” whom all young antiquaries admire, but who is in truth only the Merry Andrew of etymology, “derives Caer Gybi,” not from history, not from tradition, not from that Keby in whom both tradition and history unite, but “from Caer Corb, Irish for forces or troops” (ii. 572). No man can ever be so simple, I believe, as not to have one equally simple with himself, and repeating his fooleries after him.

long

long beyond the coming of St. Petrock, long beyond the landing of Breaca, even up into the days of Keby and of Solomon; this the king of Cornwall, and that his son; this a Christian, the first king of Cornwall probably who was so, that a Christian, a clergyman, a bishop; but both existing before “the latter end of the fourth” century, long before “all the fifth,” and very long before “most part of the sixth ;” in all which Dr. Borlase dreams he “finds very many martyrs suffering “death for the Christian faith” in Cornwall, and in which we find only Christian kings, Christian princes, or Christian priests, all professing their belief of the Gospel together, all united in that belief with the great mass of Cornish commonalty, all as unanimous in their belief and profession as all the Cornish are at this moment *.

SECTION

* Let me note here a striking proof in Dr. Borlase, of his own unfixedness of mind as to his grand point, the peculiar obstinacy of the Cornish in adhering to druidism, and shrinking back from Christianity. Finding what “is plainly a Cromlech” in Kent, but what is also given by tradition to “Catigern, brother to Vortimer king of the Britans, who [whose “father Vortigern] invited the Saxons into Britain;” yet believing it “difficult to prove “that the Christians ever erected structures of this kind,” though he has just before noticed one in Wales, with crosses upon the supporters of it (p. 226); he endeavours thus to reconcile the former fact with his general hypothesis. “If this tradition is true,” he cries, “Catigern “(it may be said) was likely a Christian, and the people who erected this monument “Christians;” when he and they were certainly Christians, as appears equally from lay accounts preceding, and from his confession immediately subsequent, “Britain having “before this,” the middle of the fifth century, even “above two hundred years before” (p. 369), “received the Christian religion. But it must be considered that the Christianity “then among the Britans,” at large, “particularly those of Cornwall,” in which region he thus acknowledges Christianity to have been settled equally as in the rest of Britain, to the rejection of his whole hypothesis; but “from whence,” he adds, in order to recover himself, “Vortimer came and succeeded his father Vortigern, who was advanced from that “earldom to be the general king of Britain:” history all false as Vortigern was king of the Dimetæ in South-Wales (Hist. of Man. ii. 16, 17, quarto); this Christianity “was so “deeply tainted with druidism,” an assertion, for the truth of which he offers not the slightest evidence, though he extends it over all Britain by his own confession, and over South-Wales particularly by his own argument; and this Christianity “exercised the great “abilities of the Irish saints;” Irish Christianity, though so fresh from druidism, not being tainted with it at all, “so long after as well as before this period,” in that Cornwall alone, within which we have hitherto seen these saints employed by the Doctor; not (as

SECTION III.

I HAVE NOW swept away, with the powerful hand of truth, that fabulous multiplicity of martyrs with which the golden legend of Dr. Borlase has filled the calendar of Cornwall; and so filled it forsooth in compliment to the unyielding genius of the very druidism which had been beaten out of all its dominions to the east as well as north, but is credulously believed, in contradiction to a host of facts, to have retired into its impregnable lines in the west. Yet I must do Cornish druidism the justice to say, that it was in some instances most disgracefully unyielding, even as unyielding as the druidism of the north or east; and I must fix some martyrs for Christianity in the calendar of this country that are all unnoticed by the Doctor, but are regularly answered by others in other parts of the island. In doing this, however, I shall have the Christian satisfaction of finding that the number of martyrs made by druidism in Cornwall, even under the hottest paroxysm of hostility against the Gospel, is less, much less than it is represented by the Doctor to be: it is, indeed, very small; yet even in what it is, Britain in general, and Devonshire in particular, partake of the ignominy with Cornwall.

here) to rectify a Christianity tainted with druidism, but to convert from druidism to Christianity itself; that “it is difficult to determine whether we are to look upon Keith Coty-house,” in Kent, “as a druid or as a Christian monument.” (P. 226.) The exclusive claim of Cornwall to perseverance in druidism, is here given up repeatedly by our author; he abandons his whole system for the sake of a temporary advantage; he confessedly makes all the Britons as tenacious of druidism as the Cornish; he indirectly makes the Kentish Britons to be peculiarly so; he even states the Cornish to be equal receivers of Christianity with the Kentish and with all the Britons. Yet he dwells upon his hypothesis at the very moment in which he is deserting it; and vainly tries, by falsehood or by sophistry, by incidents wholly untrue in themselves, or even (if true) forming no chain of reasoning, to derive the Kentish tenaciousness from the Cornish; a fact pressed hard upon him, he endeavoured to escape from its force, and he threw off his load of belief, in order to expedite his flight, yet struggled, out of a principle of shame, to conceal his conduct from himself.

That last, that crowning persecution of the Christians, which broke out under the authority of Dioclesian on the 23d of February, in the year 303, and continued to rage through nearly ten years afterwards, must stand for ever as a strong broad stamp of blood upon the forehead of heathenism; to mark the brutality of its spirit, to expose the savageness of its efforts, in opposition to the Gospel and to God. It actually carried such a sweeping destructiveness with it, in the eyes of its very directors, that they could set up inscriptions recording their own infamy in displaying their own success; and triumph in their supposed extinction of the very religion, the very name of Christianity over the whole face of the empire*. In this tempest of violence, which broke out from the depths of hell, which carried all the malignity of hell in its fury, and is to be equalled only in all the annals of human madness by the more confined hurricane that has lately burst forth among the Christians of France, renouncing their Christianity, recoiling backwards into heathenism, and there finding its original rage against the Gospel; Aaron and Julius we know to have been martyred at Caerleon in Wales, as well as Albanus at Verulam. At the martyrdom of the last, particularly, the citizens of Verulam appear to have harboured a malignity against the Gospel that was very similar to Dioclesian's, and discharged itself in a very similar manner, "as a disgrace to Albanus's memory, "and as a terror to other Christians," so we find noticed in an ancient history of his passion; "inscribing his murder upon marble, and inserting the stone in the city-walls," over the principal gateway assuredly, the entrance nearest the place of execution, and the access from London just under it†. In this persecution, too, we find some not yet held up to

* "Cluniæ enim in Hispaniâ, in pulchrâ columnâ hoc inscriptum legimus: Diocletianus Jovius et Maximian. Hercules Caes. Augg. amplificato per orientem et occidentem imp. Rom. et NOMINE CHRISTIANORUM DELETO qui rempublicam evertabant. Rursus ibidem est altera hæc inscriptio, Diocletian. Caes. Aug. Galerio in oriente adopt. SUPERSTITIONE CHRISTIANORUM DELETA et cultu deorum propagato. Leguntur hæc etiam Arevaci Hispaniæ, in columnis pluribus." Smith in Bede, p. 660, 661, from Gruter, i. 280.

† Camden, 293: "In hujus opprobrium et Christianorum terrorem, ut in antiquo ejus agone habetur, Verolamicienses ejus martyrium marmori inscripserunt, mœnibusque inseruerunt."

to fame, martyred in Devonshire and Cornwall. We do not know with a decisive certainty, indeed, that these suffered like those in the last persecution, but the analogy of history intimates they did; nor could any martyrdom but one so recent at the resurrection of Christianity from its supposed sepulchre, its resurrection (like its founders) with new power upon its arm, and with apparent divinity in its face, have left memorials of the martyrs to direct the triumphant Christians in the honours which they paid to their memories, and to point out the very scenes of their sufferings for the sites of their new churches. Thus, Albanus at Verulam, Julius and Aaron at Caerleon, were remembered well to have suffered, and to have suffered at such particular places near their respective towns. The persecution ceased about November 312; and the Christians were restored to all their rights. Then, instantly, as Gildas has already informed us concerning the whole of Roman Britain, “all the pupils of Christ in Britain, as after a long wintery night, with “ruerunt.” See also Stukeley’s Itin. Cur. plate 95. Camden’s incident is derived probably from an author cited by Leland De Script. Brit. 66, 67, yet reprobated as spurious by Usher, 80, 81, but so reprobated upon principles surely too slight for the occasion. The account was, “Ex vulgari Anglicano in sermonem Latinum a Gulielmo Albanensi monacho ‘conversa,’” says Usher. This is confessed by William himself. (Usher, 81.) Yet who wrote the English, or whence the English was derived, does not appear, while the work itself challenges a much earlier date. Against that challenge, not an atom of argument is produced; in proof of the challenge, I need only produce one passage out of the author’s own “prologus,” as cited by Usher himself: “‘Quisquis beatorum martyrum gloriosa certamina tentaverit ad memoriam revocare, necesse est, si tamen eraserit.’” Alive himself, “‘ODIA SUSTINENT PAGANORUM’.” (Usher, 81.) For a character so ASSUMED, as Usher pretends it was, so unlikely to be assumed, as so difficult to be supported, no reason positive or probable can ever be assigned: yet what is more extraordinary, the character is supported regularly and invariably to the end, as my future extracts will shew. But let me prove the point here: “‘Illinc’,” says the author concerning the scene of St. Alban’s martyrdom, “‘inter cætera multorum relatione cognovi, qualiter vir sanctus,’” &c. “‘Omnem rei seriem diligenter inquisivi, didici, et (ne lateret posteros) in hunc modum stylo memoræque mandari curavi’.” This is, in short, that very authority, I believe, upon which Bede modelled his account of the martyrdom of St. Alban, differing in nothing, as we shall soon see, from a British account of it; but having particularly the same miraculous creation of a fountain at the scene of martyrdom, and the same omission of the name of St. Alban’s converter, as this biographer of St. Alban has. (Usher, 80; and Bede, i. 7.)

“joyful

“joyful eyes receive the temperate serene light of the air of heaven; “rebuild the churches that were torn down level with the ground; lay the foundations of large churches in honour of the holy martyrs; rear them, finish them, and every where display (as it were) their victorious standards.” They constructed their churches in the west and south, equally as in the east and north, to the honour of the late martyrs, and with the names of the late martyrs affixed to them; they also constructed them with that addition of locality which constituted the principal part of the honour, which peculiarly affixed the name of the church, and was so necessary to the human mind in its full comprehension of the martyr’s merits; a position upon the very ground at which the soul of the martyr had gone on his own flame of fire to paradise. Thus the church of St. Alban was erected upon the very hill, without the walls of Verulam, on which Albanus had suffered only a few years before; as the churches of Julius and Aaron were equally constructed at their respective scenes of martyrdom, without Caerleon*. The whole island, indeed, seems to have sprung forward at these happy moments, and run to shelter itself from heathenism in the fostering arms of Christianity; the citizens of Verulam, in particular, not merely removing from the view that inscription over one of their gates, which attested their shame in witnessing their murder of St. Alban; but even recording the

* Bede, i. 7: “Passus est—beatus Albanus—die decimo kalendarum Julianarum,” June the 22d, “—juxta civitatem Verolamium;—ubi postea, redeunte temporum Christianorum serenitate, ecclesia est—constructa.—Passi sunt eâ tempestate Aaron et Julius, legionum urbis cives.” (Giraldus Cambrensis, in Itin. Walliæ, 836.) “Jacent hic [at Caerleon] duo nobiles, et post Albanum et Amphibalum præcipui Britannicæ Majoris protomartyres, et ibidem martyrio coronati, Julius scilicet et Aaron, quorum uterque ecclesiam in urbe insignem habebat suo nomine decoratam. Tres enim egregiæ in hac urbe, antiquis temporibus, fuerunt ecclesiæ, una Julii martyris,—altera vero beati Aaron, socii ejusdem, nomine fundata,—tertia verò,” &c. From the church of Julius “the house of Julian took its name,” about a mile out of town;—“the parish-church of Lhanharan Gam (corruptly for Lhan Aaron) was dedicated to the last of these; and near the church is a field termed Kae Aaron, Aaron’s Field, to this day.” (Arch. ii. 7; Gibson, 728.) “Julio—et Aaroni,” says Godwin, 598, “—patrum adhuc nostrorum memoriâ capellæ visebantur constructæ, quarum una ab orientali, altera ab occidentali parte oppidi, duobus plus minus milliaribus disjunctæ erant.” } triumphs of their new-adopted religion in the very same manner, by inscribing square stones over the gates of their walls in a pious memorial of them *.

The church of SAINT COLUMB in Cornwall derived its appellation, not (according to the very natural surmise of Camden in all his editions before that of 1607) from Columbanus, otherwise denominated Columba, the Irish saint of the Western Isles of Scotland †; but, in the correcting strain which he judiciously adopted for this edition, “from Columba, a very pious woman and a martyr, as now I have been with certainty assured from her life ‡.” He was so assured by Nicholas Roscarrock, Esq. a gentleman of family and fortune among the Cornish, and, what is more pertinent to the point, one celebrated by Carew, “for his industrious delight in matters of history and antiquity §,” from a letter dated August the 7th, 1607. The church, says the letter-writer, “in truth—taketh name of Columba, a woman-saint, “who was a virgin and martyr ||.” It is accordingly called in the Valor of Pope Nicholas, “the church of Sancta Columba ¶;” the patent for the fair in November entitles her, “Sancta Columba, the virgin,” and the fair is now held upon what is styled in the patent, “the day of

* Leland De Script. Brit. 30: “Civitas verò Albani de tyranno triumphos portis ac muris, in pium opus exsculptis quadratis saxis, inseruerunt. Cujus facti et Anonymus, “qui Vitas Albani et Amphibali elegantissime perscripsit, Saxonibus paganis Verolamium tum occupantibus mentionem facit.” The person thus mentioned with our martyr, even Amphibalus, is by some moderns, who are content to expose their own folly in exposing the falsehood of others, ridiculously supposed to have been merely the cloak of Albanus; but was the clergyman that converted him, noticed without a name by Bede, by Anonymus, and first named by Geoffrey of Monmouth, from some memorials in Wales. (Usher, 81; Leland, 6; M. Paris, iii.)

† Leland’s Coll. i. 10: “S. Columba sepultus in Higecaland,” the Saxon appellation of Iona, or Icolmkill, the very Hii of Bede, iii. 4.

‡ Camden, 140: “Columbæ piissimæ mulieris et martyris,—ut jam certo ex ejus Vitâ sum edoctus.”

§ Carew, 127.

|| Camdeni Epistolæ, p. 91.

¶ “Ecclesia Sanctæ Columbæ.”

“Sancta Columba, the virgin and martyr.*” Nor is this virgin-martyr of Cornwall the same with the virgin put to death by Aurelian at Sens in France; as she has been conjectured by some to be †. The day of the French saint is the thirty-first of December, as Bede’s Martyrology, the oldest (I believe) which we have among us, on that day notices “the passion of Sancta Columba, the virgin at Sens, under “Aurelian the emperor ‡ ;” but the fair of the Cornish saint is held on the Thursday after the thirteenth of November, and the feast on the Sunday subsequent to that. Our Cornish saint, indeed, was purely a native of Cornwall; Roman, like the virgin of the same appellation in France, like Julius too, or Albanus in Wales and Hertfordshire; yet British-Roman, the descendant probably of a Roman family settled in the country. Lives were accordingly written, we know, of St. Alban and of St. Columba in the British language §.

The town of Verulam, so famous equally in our civil and our ecclesiastical history, had shot up to a very high pitch of grandeur, and had even acquired the very rare dignity of a municipium; before the invasion of the Saxons ||. But then all its splendour was overcast, and all its majesty was lowered, for ever; the same tempest of war, which levelled Silchester, equally levelling this, and both after an obstinate defence

* Hals, 59.

† Hals, 59.

‡ Bede, 460: “Passio S. Columbæ virginis, Senones [Senonis], sub Aureliano imperatore.”

§ To those who love to mark the aberrations of the human mind, it must be amusing to observe Hals, 59, calling the saint by the name of Columbanus, in opposition to Camden’s correction of himself; because now no such person “as Sancta Columba,” or “no such “book extant” as this life of that saint, “I can hear of.” Yet, in p. 67, he owns himself to be “informed, that the patron of this church is Sancta Columba.” But after all appears the publisher, one Brice, a printer at Truro, afterwards a printer, bookseller, and author, at Exeter, with all that pertness which uneducated abilities are sure to give, with all that ignorance of reasoning which unassisted nature is equally sure to supply, and with all that tendency to scepticism, to which such ignorance, such pertness, are equally sure to gravitate as to their natural centre; sneering at both, yet finally coming back to the wrong.

|| Richard, 36: “Municipia—ii. Verolanium et Eboracum, viiii. Coloniae.” &c.

probably against the Saxons ¶. From that period, Verulam and Silchester equally became a mere range of lofty walls encircling a mass of ruins. The state of Verulam particularly is exhibited to us in these lively colours, during the tenth century. “Ealdred the [eighth] abbot” of the adjoining church of St. Alban, says the historian of the church, “ransacking the ancient subterraneous cavities of the old city which “ was called Werlamcestre, overturned and filled up all. But the rough “ broken places, and the streets, with the passages running under “ ground, and covered over with solid arches (some of which passed “ under the water of the Werlam river, which was once very large, and “ flowed about the city); he pulled down, filled up, or stopped, because “ they were the lurking holds of thieves, night-walkers, and whores: “ but the fosses of the city, and certain caverns, to which felons and “ fugitives repaired as places of shelter, from the thick woods around; “ he levelled as much as ever he could *.” Such was then the state of Verulam, ¶ Gildas Hist. viii. shews, that, some little time before his writing, the scene of St. Alban’s martyrdom was in the possession of the Saxons.—But another author, equally a Briton, equally a Christian too in heart and design, though not yet baptized, being born since the Saxons became possessed of the country, says thus of Verulam: “ “ Cives quondam Verolamenses, ob elationem cordis sui declarandam, qualiter passus sit Beatissimus Albanus in “ muris civitatis suæ sculptum reliquerunt; quam sculpturam, longo post tempore, in muris “ eorum jum rimosis, et ad ruinam inclinatis, inveni, vidique mœnia præ vetustate jam “ labi.” At what period this author wrote, is plain from the following passage: “ “ Si quis “ enim de nece martyrum aut de sanctorum gloriâ narrationem cœperit ordinare, mox qui “ eorum felicitati invident irasci, fremere, et ad mortem usque persequi, consueverunt. “ Inde est, quòd passionem Sancti Albani martyris, qualicunque stylo posteris traditurus, “ operi titulum non præpono; malens tacendo nomen omittere, quàm loquendo nomen “ puriter et vitam amittere. Quamvis igitur insidiantium laqueis plena sint omnia, sup- “ presso tamen nomine, quid viderim, quid audiverim, non tacebo.—Romam proficiscor, “ ut illuc gentilitatis errore deposito, et lavacro regenerationis adepto, veniam assequi “ merear delictorum.” (Leland De Script. Brit. 66, 67.) The marble recording the murder of Albanus, therefore, had not been torn down, but turned with its face inward, as the inscription must certainly have been placed out of sight, and yet appeared in the gaping walls afterward.

* M. Paris, 994: “Ealdredus abbas—antiquas scripturas subterraneas,” I read, antiquos scroliculos subterraneos, “veteris civitatis quæ Werlamcestre dicebatur, perscrutatas “ [perscrutatus], evertit omnia et implevit. Tracones verò et vias, cum mentibus subter-Verulam, and such it had then been for four centuries: the church of St. Alban all the while standing solitary upon its adjoining hill, and from the woody height of its own Holm-hurst commanding all the mournful scene of desolation! Yet the town of St. Alban's grew up, not (as might naturally be surmised) from the gradually attracted population of Verulam, for Verulam had no population at all, we see; but from a population invited out of the neighbouring country at once, by Ulsin, or Ulsig, the eighth abbot †. Then Eadmer the ninth, employing men to ransack those ruins again, "in the midst of the ancient city they tore up the foundations of a great place," says the same historian of the church; "and, while they were wondering at the remains of such large buildings, they found in a hollow repository of one wall, as in a small press, among some lesser books and rolls, an unknown volume of one book, which was not mutilated by its long continuance there; of which neither the letters nor the dialect, from their antiquity, were known to any person who could then be found; but the inscriptions and titles in it shone resplendent in letters of gold." So early were illuminations used in our books! "The boards of oak," so old are books in boards! "the strings of silk," of such antiquity are silken strings to books! "in great measure retained their original strength and beauty. When inquiry had been industriously made very far and wide concerning the notices in this book, at last they found one priest, aged and decrepit, a man of great erudition, Unwon by name; who, knowing the dialect and letters of different languages, read the writing of the before-mentioned book distinctly and openly. In the same manner he read without hesitation, and he explained without difficulty, notices in other books, that were found in the same room and within the same press. For the letters were such, as used to be
“ raneis

"rancis et solide per artificium arcuatis (quorum quidam subtus aquam Warlamia, quæ quondam, maxima, civitati fuit circumfusa, transierunt); diruit, implevit, aut obturavit. Erant enim, latibula latronum, vespillonum, et meretricum. Fossata vero civitatis, et quasdam speluncas, ad quas quasi ad refugia redeuntes, malefici et fugitivi a densis silvis vicinis fugerunt in quantum potuit explanavit."

† M. Paris, 993: "Pagum—Sancti Albanis et incolas, dilexit et promovit; ab partibus circumjacentibus ipsum,—populis convocatis fecit inhabitari."

“ written at the time when Ferulam was inhabited ; and the dialect was “ that of the ancient Britons, then used by them. There were some “ things” in the other books, “ written in Latin, but these were not “ curious ; and in the first book, the greater one, of which I have made “ mention before, he found written THE HISTORY OF SAINT ALBAN, the “ protomartyr of the English ; which the church, at this very day, “ recites and reads ; to which that excellent scholar Bede lends his “ testimony, differing in nothing from it. That book—, in which the “ history of St. Alban was contained, was reposit with the greatest “ regard in the treasury of the abbey, and exactly as the aforesaid “ presbyter read the book written in the ancient dialect of England or “ Britain, with which he was well acquainted ; abbot Eadmer caused it “ to be faithfully and carefully set down by some of the wiser brethren “ in the convent, and then more fully taught in the public preach“ ings. But when the history was thus made known (as I have said) to “ several, by being written in Latin ; what is wonderful to tell, the “ primitive and original work fell away in round pieces, and was soon “ reduced irrecoverably to dust*.” This is a most curious, amusing, and

* M. Paris, 994, 995 : “ Fossores,—in medio civitatis antiquæ, ejusdam magni palatii “ fundamenta diruerunt, et, cum tantorum vestigia ædificiorum admirarentur, invenerunt “ in ejusdam muri coneavo deposito quasi almariolo, cum quibusdam minoribus libris et “ rotulis, ejusdam codicis ignotum volumen, quod parum fuit ex tam longinquâ morâ “ demolitum. Cujus nec litera nec idioma alicui tunc invento cognitum præ antiquitate “ fuerat, quarum epigrammata et tituli aureis literis fulserunt redimitti. Asseres querni, “ ligamina seriea, pristinam in magnâ parte fortitudinem et decorem retinuerunt. De ejus “ libri notitiâ cum multum longè latèque fuerat diligenter inquisitum, tandem unum senem “ jam decrepitum invenerunt sacerdotem, literis bene eruditum, nomine Unwonam, qui, “ imbutus diversorum idiomatum linguis ac literis, legit distinctè et apertè scripta libri “ prænominati. Similiter quæ in aliis codicibus, in eodem almariolo et in eodem habitaculo “ repertis, legit indubitanter, et exposuit expressè. Erat enim litera qualis scribi solet “ tempore quo cives Warlamecestram inhabitabant, et idioma antiquorum Britonum, quo “ tunc temporis utebantur. Aliqua tamen in Latino, sed his non opus erat : in primo “ autem libro, scilicet majori, ejus prius fecimus mentionem, scriptam invenit historiam “ de Sancto Albano Anglorum protomartyre. Quam ecclesia, diebus hodiernis, recitat “ legendo. Cui perhibet egregius doctor Beda testimonium, in nullas discrepando.—Ille “ liber, in quo historia Sancti Albani continebatur, in thesauro charissimè reponebatur. Et and striking discovery, exhibiting a little scene of Herculaneum by an anticipation of some centuries to our eyes. It shews also the amazing ignorance of the British language, which at this period prevailed close to the very walls of that celebrated capital of a British nation; and the still more amazing knowledge perhaps in one divine, amidst such a general ignorance, concerning that language. But it equally shews the knowledge to have continued in one or more to, or nearly to, the very days of Bede; as he had procured a translation of it, or a similar work, from the British, two or three ages before this discovery of the manuscript, a translation “differing in nothing from it;” as the English, when reclaimed to Christianity, adopted St. Alban, the protomartyr of the Britons, for “the protomartyr of the English too,” and as “the history “of St. Alban,” which had been “recited and read” in the church of the Britons assuredly, became equally recited and read in that of the Saxons also *. And it still more clearly proves the martyrdom of St. Alban

“ sicut

“sicut prædictus presbyter illum antiquo Anglico vel Britannico idiomate conscriptum, in quo peritus extitit, legerat; abbas iste Eadmerus per prudentiores fratrum in conventu fecit fideliter ac diligenter exponi, et plenius in publico prædicatione edoceri. Cùm autem conscripta historia in Latino pluribus (ut jam dictum est) innotuisset; exemplar primum ac originale (quod mirum est dictu) irrestaurabiliter in pulverem subito redactum cecidit annulatum.” The site of this palace so stored with literature, heathen and Christian, remained conjecturally visible to the eye of antiquarianism, as late as the days of Leland: “vidi—locum, nunc obductum fruticibus, ubi probabilis conjectura est fuisse palatium Verolamii.” (Coll. iv. 168.)

* Bede, i. 7; and Usher, St. M. Paris, 995, shews the account recited in St. Alban's own church, to be different in nothing from Bede's, though taken from the manuscript discovered at Verulam. Yet the account given us by Anonymus is just the same in substance with both, having the same creation of a fountain by a miracle on the hill of martyrdom, and the same omission of the name of St. Alban's converter; even being professedly the mere echo of that tradition, which would be sure to be formed from the memory of an account written by the pen, and recited in the church, before. “Quid viderim,” says the author as to the ruined walls of Verulam, “quid audiverim,” as to the traditional history of St. Alban, “non tacebo.” (Leland De Script. Brit. 66.) He refers only to colloquial narration for his authority, as he also hints just before at his endeavouring to draw such narrations from the lips of persons around him, and so provoking the pagan masters of them all; “si quis—de nece martyrum—narrationem coeperit ordinare,” &c. Nor can any objection be raised to this, though Usher, p. 80, has attempted to raise one, from the seemingly

Alban to have been written originally at the moment of restored Christianity, when the memory of St. Alban's townsmen still retained faithfully upon its waxen tablets, all that they themselves had seen of the sufferings of St. Alban a few years before †.

Just

ingly prophetic turn of a sentence. The sentence is not prophetic in reality. It is only in that tone of seeming prophecy, which hope, which earnest hope frequently gives to the mind of man; the wish that an event may be springing forth from the heart to the pen, and there forming itself into a trust that it will be. "Tempus erit," says the author, "ut confidimus, quo religiosi viri, viri Christiani ad prædicandum gentibus venient in Britanniam: verum tempus futuræ gratiæ quando futurum sit, quia certum non habeo, isthic hujus lætitiæ magnitudinem non expecto."

† "Anonymus," says Leland, concerning the writer cited before, an author all unknown to scholars at present, yet writing at a period for which we peculiarly want authors, and highly praised by Leland, "vir non mediocriter eruditus, eo tempore floruit," that I have noticed already; "—et, quoniam Albani Verolamiensis—clarissima erat apud indigenas memoria, omnia diligentissimè, sed tanquam aliud agens, didicit, quæ illi, vel usque ad mortem invicti, pro religione Christianâ patiebantur. Cùmque jam probè instructus esset, calammum sumpsit pingendæ historiæ non ineptum; ac operi longè sanctissimo ita incubuit, ut nullus unquam Apelles gentilium deorum effigies meliùs expresserit, quam hic Albanum. —Anonymi opus floridum, luculentum, venustum, vivit perpetuoque vivet." That Mr. Newcome should know nothing of this work, or, if known, should not dare to use it; is not to be censured. A reprobation from such a writer as Usher, acts with historians like a horse-shoe over the door upon witches, frightening all from entrance. Nor ought we to expect more than the common portion of courage, from men bred up in all the sequestration of studiousness, and consequently shrinking like hot-house plants before the blasts without.

But Mr. Newcome, erring in another way, and confounding the "little chapel without" the walls of Verulam, built formerly by the new converts in honour of this blessed martyr, with a "chapel" within the walls "called afterwards St. German's chapel;" says, "this church had been demolished by the [Saxon] invaders near 300 years before" Offa, yet, "this chapel—would tend in some degree to preserve a remembrance of him;" and adds, "it is likely that the memory of Alban lived only in Offa's time, in the report and tradition of old people" (p. 25); when Offa died in 794, when Bede finished his history in 731, and Bede gives us a large account of St. Alban's martyrdom; when Anonymus writes his history about 590 before, and gives us an account just as large. Yet Mr. Newcome subjoins in the same strain concerning the discovery at Verulam, "this story hath so much the air of a monkish imposture," though he acknowledges it to be related by M. Paris himself, "and of that affected reverence which they would draw to their founders," he means to their saints, Alban being the saint and not the founder of the church; "that I have written it at length, as a just specimen of that art which monks used, to sanctify"

"falsehood

Just so, assuredly, was the case with the Sancta Columba of Cornwall. An account of her martyrdom was drawn up at the same period, equally written in the British language, and equally recited in the church-offices of Britain. "Her LIFE," said Mr. Roscarrock in his letter to Camden, and by his language shews it to have been, like that of St. Alban, or like that of all other saints, much more ample than a mere description of her martyrdom, even to extend into a history of her whole life, "I HAVE IN MY HANDS; it was translated out of the COR-

"falsehood or novelty," a distinction strange in itself, novelty (if not truth) being falsehood in facts, "and often downright fraud and deception," fraud and deception as crowning falsehood. Here, however, is a positive charge of falsification brought, against all monks in general, and these monks in particular, for this asserted discovery of St. Alban's life. Before this asserted discovery, even ages before it, the whole of the life was known to Bede, and had been published by Bede to all the kingdom. What peculiar end of honour then to the saint, could be served by such an imposture and such a forgery? None certainly. Yet, in the poor spirit of Protestant scepticism, which believes every thing ill, however absurd, concerning monks, and which is fully as ridiculous in the eye of sober criticism, as monkish credulity itself; this author speaks holdly in the charge, because he speaks from prejudice; but then sinks into weakness in the proof, because he is dealing with reason. "For it is probable," he thus founding a violent charge upon a mere probability, that "Ælfric the Second composed this little history in Latin; because in bishop Osmond's breviary, "or mass-book, there is an office composed by Ælfric in honour of Alban" (P. 35.) The argument of probability here is just as absurd in itself, as it was before in proof of positive crimination. That Ælfric composed this history is not probable, though Ælfric composed an office. His writing the latter is no argument the most distantly probable, that he drew up the former. And the stone fortress of evidence for the discovery, is not to be shaken by pointing such a spear of straw against it. But, in fact, Ælfric only took the discovered history, framed from it an office for divine worship, and set this office to music. Ælfric, says M. Paris himself, 995, when chantor of St. Alban's, was persuaded by his brother then abbot, "ut historiam ad notam de Sancto Albano componeret." This M. Paris notices again, in 996, as "quam nunc cantator composuit historiam, et eidem notam melicam adaptavit; et, auctoritate fratris sui archiepiscopi, multis locis Angliæ fecit publicari, diemque ejusdem martyris honorari." This office, therefore, was used peculiarly at St. Alban's. Yet it was all taken from that very history, of which it is ridiculously brought to disprove even the existence; because that very history is noted by M. Paris himself again, as "quam ecclesia diebus hodiernis recitat legendo." (P. 994.) But we here see the word composed so early as this period in use, for setting to music; and Mr. Newcome deceived by the double meaning, to make a composer the very author.

“NISH*.” This testimony is full and complete. The saint, whose life had been written in Cornish, must certainly have been a saint of Cornwall; as he, whose history had been written in the British of Verulam, was certainly a British saint of that town. Nor can the non-appearance of the original life at present be alleged against the existence of it; any more in the case of Sancta Columba, than in that of St. Alban. Nor can the denominated translation of her life be therefore surmised to be the real original; because the translation itself is non-apparent equally with the original at present, and the very existence of the translation may on that principle be equally discredited. The translation of Sancta Columba’s life as undoubtedly existed in the hands of Mr. Roscarrock, as that of St. Alban’s existed in the abbey of his own name, and in the history of our own Bede. But, as the original of St. Alban’s life was reduced into dust from the dampness in which it had lain so long, by the time the translation was freely circulated; so that of Sancta Columba’s was thrown aside, resigned up “blattarum ac tinearum epulæ,” even at length lost for ever, from the translation of the Cornish into English, from the insolent triumph of the English over the Cornish, and from the Protestant indifference to the lives of saints, that prevailed equally with the English language, triumphing over all history, all gratitude, all reverence, in its Gothic spirit.

In the lives of these saints have I already tracked the steps of Christianity, moving in majesty over the subject empire of Rome, the Roman provinces of Britain, and the angular region of Cornwall. I have thus wound my way slowly, to her incorporation with the civil economy of nations, to her adoption and patronage among the kings of the globe. I have particularly reached the year 325, twelve years after the cessation of all hostility against the Gospel, and about the year when a king of Cornwall was baptized by the scriptural name of Solomon; just as one of the martyrs in the last persecution had been previously baptized, by the appellation of Aaron. The immediate predecessor of Solomon was the very king probably, by whose authority, under the edict of Dioclesian, Sancta Columba was martyred. Accordingly we find a Cornish sovereign residing in the parish of St. Columb, about a mile to the south of the church, and at a house still denominated Tre-kyning, or the abode of princes; a house, to which there is a formul causey yet apparent, from a remarkable fortress adjoining, a Roman camp originally, but the reputed castle of king Arthur afterwards, Arthur being almost as popular a hero in romance with the Cornish as with the Welsh *. At the extremity of the estate still belonging to this house, and upon the edge of the moor then adjoining assuredly to its demesne, the ground there carrying all the appearance of a moory enclosure to this day, being plainly a part of that watery wilderness of desolation, which is now denominated Goss Moor, which was even when Leland crossed it “a morisch ground, al baren of woodde †;” but was formerly covered with woods, as tradition reports the timber of the church of St. Columb to have been all cut upon it, and therefore carried the appellation of Gosse (C.), a wood originally, the reported scene of Arthur’s huntings; remains a monument at present, apparently the tomb of a British king. This, in the language familiar to the Britons of Wales, is denominated Coyt ‡.

* Camdeni Epistolæ, p. 91.

The

* Kcann (I.), Kyn (W.), Kyn (C.), is the head in the human body; and hence Kyn (W.) in composition is the first, or chief, or excellent, Cyntâv (W.), Kensa (C.), Kenta (A.), Kcann (I.), are first, and Cyn (W.) is a prince. Tre-Cyn-en (C.) would be the house of princes. In 3 Hen. IV. “Johannes Hamelyn tenet dimidium parvi feodi in Trekinnen, “Radulphus Darundle tenet dimidium parvi feodi in Trekinnen,” both in the hundred of Pyder. (Carew, 43.) “Yea, tradition tells us, he [Arthur] resided at Castle Dennis.” From Castle Dennis does “a stony causey, now covered with grass, conduct you up and “down the hill,” on which the fortress stands, “towards Tre-kyning, that is to say, the “king’s, prince’s, or ruler’s town.” (Hals, 64.) The estate is now divided in two, and has two houses upon it, Higher and Lower Tre-kyning. The Higher was called simply “Tre-kyninge” in the very days of Hals (p. 66), and the Lower denominated “Tre-kyninge “Vean, i. e. Tre-kinninge the Less” (p. 67). The ancient house on the Higher was pulled down, and another erected on the site, by “James Jenkyn, gent. attorney at law, temp. “James I.” (p. 66); as the appearance of the modern building suggests, and as the settlement of the Jenkyns then in it confirms. Some slight remains of the old house still continue; but tradition reports the new to be hardly a tenth part of the old in size.

† Itin. iii. 12, 13.

‡ “Not far from this Coyt, at the edge of the Goss Moor, there is a large stone, wherein “is deeply imprinted a mark, as it had been the impression of four horse-shoes; and [it] is

The top-stone of it too, in a strain of romance that accounts very satisfactorily for the name, is fabled by tradition to have been used by the devil, as the top-stone in some of the Welsh is equally fabled to have been used by Arthur, that equal proprietor of all extraordinary works among the Welsh populace, with the devil among the English; in the British exercise of quaiting §. The top-stone is the most striking part of the whole, and therefore the denominator of it; being a black kind of iron-stone, very hard, very massy, and no less than thirteen or fourteen tons in weight. Yet it has been raised by some power of mechanics, that therefore is supposed popularly to be all unknown to the present age, and to shew us in union with Stonehenge and Abury temples, our inferiority in one important region of physics to the rudest, equally as to the most refined of our British ancestors*. That some of the Roman or Græcian powers of mechanism may be lost, some of the Græcian sublimities or Roman refinements in the geometry of raising immense weights; is readily to be conceived, and easily to be conceded. “No one is ignorant of the toil and labour,” says the sober Montfaucon himself, which “it cost the Cavalier Fontana, a celebrated architect,

“to this day called King Arthur’s Stone. Yea, tradition tells us they were made by king “Arthur’s horse’s feet, when he resided at Castle Dennis and hunted in the Goss Moor. “But this stone is now overturned by some seekers for money.” (Hals, 64.)

§ “From the oblate and spreading form of the upper stone, resembling a discus,” says Dr. Borlase, very justly, as the form has certainly suggested the tradition; “this monument “is in Cornwall called by the name of Quoit.” (P. 224.) Yet the tradition is not peculiar to Cornwall, any more than the form, being as extensive as the tradition concerning Arthur himself; because (what Dr. Borlase immediately adds) “in Merionidshire (Wales) also “there is one called Koeten-Arthur, or Quoits of Arthur; and another in Carnarvounshire, “called Bryn y Goeten, or the Quoit Hillock.”

* Hals, 64: “How, or by what art, this prodigious flat stone should be placed on the “top of the others, amusetth the wisest mathematicians, engineers, or architects, to tell or “conjecture.” Arch. ii. 272. Mr. Pownall: “It hath always been matter of wonder with “the vulgar, and a subject of disquisition with the learned, to conceive how these unwieldy “masses of stone, of a bulk and weight beyond the commonly known powers of man to deal “with, could have been moved, conveyed such a length of way as some must have been, “and how finally they were raised such heights. The one have imputed these effects to “magicians and giants; the others, to operations equally fanciful, though assuming the “name of philosophy.”

“to

“ to erect the obelisk in St. Peter’s Place, which is yet to be seen there. “ The design of the machine he made use of to effect it is engraved and “ published, and is looked upon by our architects with admiration. But, “ after all, what was this obelisk in comparison of those colossal statues of above a hundred feet high, of the colossus at Rhodes, and even of “ the obelisk which is before St. John Lateran, which far surpasses in “ magnitude that of St. Peter, and which would have lain prostrate to “ this day, had it not been broken into several pieces by its fall, which “ facilitated the raising it again. But all these great machines are now “ lost; so that, if any thing of uncommon weight was to be erected. “ new machines and engines must be thought upon, the expense of “ which would perhaps be greater than the work itself, though it fall “ far short of those enormous buildings the ancients raised. These “ curious inventions, I say, are all lost through the injury of time; and “ nothing remains to us but the machines they made use of to erect “ the obelisk and columns of the Hippodrome at Constantinople, which, “ after all, is so imperfectly represented, that I question whether any “ thing can be made of it or not*.” These glorious inventions of the geometrical genius of Rome, or Athens, were undoubtedly swept away by that grand revolution in all the eastern and western parts of the globe, the subversion of the Roman empire; which turned back the sun of science many degrees upon the dial, and plunged all the arts in the gloom of midnight. Then such only as were calculated for the reduced stature of man, emerged from the gloom again; and the others were left to perish there, as adapted to purposes too great and gigantic for the new *pigmy*s of the earth†. Yet, with all this ample allowance in favour

* Montfaucon, iii. part ii. c. i.

† In Arch. vi. 59, Mr. Pownall notes a “ rock whose weight is twelve hundred tons,” recently raised out of a swamp in Russia, drawn upon rolling balls several ~~miles~~ by land, sent on a float to Petersburg, and there disembarked to make the pedestal for a statue of Peter the Great, by the work of Count Carbars, of Cefsalonia; a work, adds Mr. Pownall, at the close, “ which appears to me, not only the greatest operation of mechanics which “ was ever effected in our world, but unique.” Pen’s authorem sit fides! In Arch. viii. 444, we have this account, much less marvellous in itself: “ The greatest work of this “ kind,” says Mr. Barrington there, “ seems to have been the removal of the rock in favour of Roman or Græcian machinery, I cannot extend one particle of it to the British. That a principle of mechanic power, which was known to the very Britons themselves in all their rudeness before the Roman arrival, should be effaced entirely from the memory, and wholly unconceivable by the mind, of the present generation of Britons, would be one of the most extraordinary incidents in the whole history of our island; would indeed be an incident of so miraculous a quality, as not indeed (according to the “insaniens sapientia” of some reasoners) to become absolutely incredible in itself, but to require the highest degree of evidence for it. The fact, however, is entirely different. We have common machines at present, that, by means of the screw, can raise 283 hundred weight, or more than fourteen tons; we have also improved machines, that, by an addition of four pulleys to the screw, unite all the mechanical powers in one grand combination together, and can therefore raise a weight of 2400 hundreds, or 120 tons; yet the largest stone in that structure of the largest stones among the Britons, Abury, on the largest scale of estimation, is not more than seventy tons*. How practicable then was it for the Britons, even in a much lower acquaintance than what we have with the mechanic powers, to raise such stones as the coverers of our coysts, as the squared pillars and flat architraves of Stonehenge, and the vast monstrous masses of Abury? Yet, at the same time, how highly do all these shew them advanced in the use of engines with the screw, even under their state of rudeness, and before the coming of the Romans, to be capable of raising five times as great a weight as our common machines, and more than half as great as our improved can do!

Our coyst is formed of five stones, one covering, three supporting, and one buttressing, with a cove or hollow under the covering and “Russia, which serves as a pedestal to the statue of Peter the Great. The engineer upon this occasion was the Count de Carbari, who took the advantage of a frost, and with the assistance of four hundred labourers brought it to Petersburg. For an account of the ingenious expedients which were also used, see the Count’s own relation, illustrated by engravings.”

* Stukeley’s Abury, 17.

between

between the other stones, now used for a pig's-house, just as the temple of Peace at Rome is made a fold for sheep on every Friday, the ancient and modern market-day of the Forum, but allowing three or four men to stand upright within it. The side-stone on the left or north is a spar exactly perpendicular, seven feet in height, and four feet six inches in width at the middle; the side-stone on the right or south is an iron-stone six feet eleven inches high, and three feet seven inches wide in the middle; the back-stone on the east is equally an iron-stone, seven feet six inches in tallness, and three feet three inches in width at the middle; and the coverer, which is equally an iron-stone, lies reclining from this along those, forming a declivity of 19 degrees 40 minutes from east to west*. I mention these little circumstances, not from an antiquary's parade of accuracy in petty uninteresting points, but to explain more clearly a peculiar incident in the construction of the whole; the northern corner of the back-stone appears to have broken off under the weight of the top-stone, as the latter was laid or was settling upon the former; and the top-stone now touches not the back-stone in that corner at all, resting only on the other, the southern corner. In consequence of the accident the whole weight nearly of the top-stone was cauted off upon the adjoining side-stone on the right or south; this, finding that to press with a force which it was not calculated to bear, began to shrink from its original uprightness, and to lean considerably towards the north; it would have leaned very considerably if the eastern edge of it had not lapped over the southern of the back-stone, there impinged strongly upon this in its inclination, and been stopped by the resistance which it thus encountered: even with that resistance, it has come to lean no less than 16 degrees 30 minutes to the north, or two feet out of the true perpendicular. The whole building, therefore, was in the most imminent hazard of being soon off its poise, and the supporting stones were likely to be crushed to the ground by the covering stone. To prevent this, with the same skill and boldness which could raise such masses upon such supporters, which could also calculate the duration of a structure so warping, and even rest secure enough in their calculations to work under the warping structure, a fifth stone was introduced into it, being thrust in behind the side-stone on the north, as a buttress to the northern edge of the back-stone. A stone was hastily chosen, tapering upwards in form, but about six feet in tallness, a kind of bastard spar, having two legs, a long and a short one, to it; the long leg was pitched in the ground, while the short remains above ground useless, and the body of the stone was then fixed reclining in a sharp angle against the edge of the back-stone, so as to compose a rude kind of powerful arc-boutant to it. Thus buttressed, the back-stone has remained between the supporting and the pressing stones, without any inclination at all to the north; yet with a projection to the west, the quarter on which it felt no resistance, of 7 degrees 30 minutes, or one foot from the perpendicular. Thus has the structure stood as firm as if no misfortune had befallen it, and is likely to stand till the end of time. Yet what is the design and drift of such a building? On this question antiquaries have been much divided, learning perhaps puzzling the intellect equally with ignorance, and good sense standing frequently a mute upon the stage, that erudition may stalk in declamations along it. It is not what it has been considered by the generality, an altar-monument for the oblation of sacrifices; the very aspect of it proclaiming to every eye which can see, and to every mind which can think, that such it could never have been: the very view thus becomes demonstration itself, and all good sense must have been buried in a quagmire of learning before it could have been believed to be such. It is merely a sepulchral monument, merely a mighty tomb, constructed at such a vast expense of manual labour, and with such high exertion of mathematical knowledge, to save the remains buried within it from all probability of violation, yet to honour the remains with a memorial equally conspicuous and grand.

* How diametrically contrary to the truth, then, does Mr. Hals, p. 69, speak of it as "bending towards the east" instead of the west!

That such a monument as this, which the Welsh antiquaries have recently taught us to call a CROMLECH, was not an altar, Dr. Borlase has argued with much force, yet not with all which the argument should

should surely have suggested*. Mr. Pegge, indeed, has written in opposition to the Doctor, but has adduced nothing that carries the weight of a straw in the balance†. The Doctor, however, has brought from the Lonthiana of Mr. Wright a positive proof for the sepulchral nature of the cromlech‡, a proof which the wary wisdom of Mr. Pegge has not presumed to encounter. To this I add a proof equally positive, and from Cornwall instead of Ireland, lying open to the public eye in such a work as Norden's, a work that unites with Carew to compose a primer (as it were) for Cornish antiquaries. "Withiell—a parish," cries this Carew Redivivus, "wherein one Gydlye not manie yeares since, "as he was digging [into] a borowe or burial hill,—founde in the bottome "of the borow 3 whyte stones sett triangularly as pillers supporting "another stone nere a yarde square, and UNDER IT A EARTHEN POTT, "verie thyck, HAULFE FULL OF BLACK SLYME MATTER, seeminge to have "bene THE CONGEALED ASHES of some worthy man," some man of worth, "THER COMITTED IN THIS MANNER TO HIS BURIALL§." This was a cromlech with a barrow over it, and therefore could not possibly be an altar. All the larger barrows in the isle, as the Carn Beacon of Cornwall, or the Silbury Hill of Wiltshire, have (I doubt not) such subterraneous cromlechs in them; all resting, as that rested, "in the "bottome of the borow," and covering a body burnt or unburnt below. Nor is cromlech the native name of these sepulchral structures, it being merely one used popularly in Wales from what was seen by the eye in some, the reclining posture of that top-stone which had no mound upon it||; while the native, the general appellation is obviously Tumpath, in Welsh a hillock, a knap, a tump; or Tuma, Tuama, Tamba, in Irish a tump, a sepulchre, a tomb. Thus we have "a round mount or bar-

* P. 226-230. He has even been weak enough, in 228, to aver, that it was designed "first, on every side to fence and surround the dead body from the violences of the weather," when a common grave, all level with the earth, would answer this, and more effectually, than the superb monument of stone.

† Arch. iv. 114.

‡ Borlase, 232, 233.

§ P. 70.

|| Rowlands, 47.

“row at this town,” as Gibson informs us concerning Bala in Merionethshire, “called Tommen y Bala,” or the tomb at Bala*: Tommen in Welsh signifying a hillock primarily, and (as here) a tomb derivatively. This, indeed, is supposed from its name, form, and situation, “not to have been erected for burial,” but for warfare†, when its very appellation shews it to have been for burial only: such appellations denote the popular meaning of the objects, and such suppositions betray the learned reference of them. The popular understanding keeps generally to the solid ground of actual appearance, and of immemorial tradition combined together; while the genius of learning mounts astride upon its witches’ broom, and flies away to the moon. Barrows are denominated tombs in British, on the same principle upon which tombs are denominated barrows in English; because tombs for ages were merely barrows, and barrows were the only burrows or burying-places for ages.

But let us pursue this thought a little farther. At Inverness we have the “strange-shaped hill of Tommen Heurich,” says Mr. Pennant, and “—that singular Tommen is of an oblong form, broad at the base, and “sloping on all sides towards the top, so that it looks like a great ship with its keel upwards.—It is perfectly detached from any other hill, “and, if it was not for its great size, might pass for a work of art‡.” A work of art it undoubtedly is, notwithstanding its great size, and a tomb, too, constructed in the magnificent size of British art. “About “a mile westward from the town of Inverness,” adds an author who published some years before Mr. Pennant, yet seems all unknown to him, “there rises out of a perfect flat a very regular hill, whether natural or artificial, I could never find by any tradition; the natives call “it Toma Heurach: it is almost in the shape of a Thames wherry turned keel upwards, for which reason they sometimes call it Neah’s Ark. “The length of it is about 400 yards, and the breadth at bottom about “150. From below, at every point of view, it seems to end at top in “a very narrow ridge; but when you are there you find a plain large “ enough to draw up two or three battalions of men *.” From all this the hill appears to be in the form of a boat, or of what is only a larger boat, a ship; is therefore not natural, but artificial; and has therefore also been denominated in Erse Toma-heurach or the Curragh Barrow, a barrow far exceeding Silbury Hill in size, being even the largest in the whole island. It must accordingly have been much admired by the Roman ala or wing of horse, once in garrison within the Alata Castra, on the site of the castle at Inverness, that little steep hill which adjoins closely to the town, and commands the pass over the Ness, then a ford, but now a bridge. “ There is in Perthshire,” notes Mr. Guthry, a Scotchman, witnessing a Scotch monument, witnessing this without any recollection of that, and actually turning our remark into a reality, “ a barrow which seems to be a British erection, and the most beautiful of the kind perhaps in the world: it exactly resembles the figure of a ship with the keel uppermost. The common people call it Ternay, “ which some interpret to be Terræ Navis, the Ship of Earth †.” This, then, is another barrow constructed in the form of a boat or ship, and distinguished accordingly among the Romans themselves by a title that has no foundation in the Erse language, and is therefore a corruption colloquially transmitted of Terræ Navis into Ternay. The corruption is still retained in the Erse, as Tir (E.) is land, and Tir-mor (E.), or great land, is a continent; and as Nacbh (E.), a ship, is even written Naoi in Irish. The Romans saw this barrow as well as the other with admiration, even named this from what they saw, and gave it a name which has been surprisingly preserved to the present day: so very ancient is this barrow confessed to be by its Roman name! so very ancient, therefore, are these ship-barrows in general confessed to be, by this in particular! Nor are these, we must remember, confined to Scotland; we have them equally in England. “ Dr. Salmon,” we are informed, “ describes a barrow of the same form at Haltwisel, in Northumberland,

* Gibson, c. 793.

† Ibid. ibid.

‡ Tour in Scotland, 1769, i. 137, 138.

* Letters from a Gentleman in the North of Scotland, 1754, vol. i. 277. The author's name (I think) was the same as his bookseller's, Birt, who returned to London, there lived till he had come to his last guinea, and then, with a horrible deliberateness of impiety that marks the last extreme of infidelity, coolly shot himself with a pistol.

† Guthry, 147, edit. 1774.

“ upon an eminence above South-Tyne. The country-people call it “ Castle-hill; but, as it is in no defensible shape, he,” with all the folly of unthinkingness in conjectures, “ supposes it made by the Danes, as “ a memorial of victory,” a ship a memorial of a victory gained by land!!! “ It bulged out on each side like a ship, is” like a ship “ contracted at “ both ends, and,” like a ship again, “ is lower at the middle than at “ the ends. Mr. Vine” also “ describes one of this form,” we are told, “ but only 130 feet long, in Sussex*.” Even “ not far from “ Upper Stirthill, in the parish of Burton Bradstock, and hundred of “ Whitechurch, Dorsetshire, and near the road between Dorchester and “ Bridport,” adds Mr. Hutchins, “ is a vast barrow, called Shipton Hill. “ It stands on an eminence, and at a distance looks like a large boat, or “ hull of a ship, turned keel upwards. It is 749 feet long, 161 broad “ at the top, and 147 high in a slant line. It seems to receive its name “ from its form, and is 250 feet longer than Silbury barrow in Wilt- “ shire†.” But, as Mr. Hutchins subjoins, “ Wormius speaks of them “ as appropriated to kings, and peculiar to the earlier age, when the “ bodies were burned‡.” The authority of Wormius is of little moment with me, upon such a subject. He knew too little of remains purely Celtic, to determine about their designation or their date. But here he determines with good sense in his favour. He recognises ship-barrows as existent in his own country, and existent only as the traditional barrows of kings. The size of the barrow, indeed, denotes plainly the grandeur of the person buried. And as the assimilation of the barrow to the keel of a coracle in form, must have resulted from some vapour of fancy that we cannot catch in our alembic of history at present; so does the assimilation itself appear upon the face of the Erse to have been very frequent in fact, because Gerach (E.) is a coracle, and Curagh (E.) is a burying-place. Yet all these coracle barrows were merely like the smaller that we have just seen, cromlechs covered with barrows. Their magnitude shews this. They are peculiarly, therefore, the barrows for kings. For others, as the pomp of sepulture shrunk up in the shrinking size of the sepulchre, barrows contracted into mounts, and dwindled away into hillocks; long the nobles reposed under hillocks and the kings under mounts, yet both in chests of stone covered with mounds of earth, as at Withiel or Carn Beacon, or in chests formed above ground, and conspicuous to the eye, as at St. Columb.

* Survey of England, p. 618, and Gentleman's Magazine, 1768, p. 384.

† Dorsetshire, i. 341.

‡ Ibid. ibid.: “ Regios tumulos ad magnitudinem et figuram carinæ maximæ navis ex his quas possidebant fabricatos volunt. Mon. Dan. p. 42.”

But, to these two cromlechs for a king or a noble in Cornwall, let me add one for a noble only, even equally with both of them a sepulchre in Cornwall, and a sepulchre still more circumstantially than at Withiel, shewing the cromlech covered with a barrow. In the middle of that extended waste the downs of St. Austle, was what was called ONE BARROW. This waste, in 1801, was resolved to be enclosed, and the barrow was obliged to be levelled; the finer parts of the earth to be used for manure, and the rubbish apparent upon it to be turned into a fence. In this operation the single workman came near the centre, and there found a variety of stones, all slates, ranged erect in an enclosure nearly square. The stones were about one foot and a half in height, apparently fixed in the ground before the formation of the barrow, and then covered over with rubbish in order to form the barrow. The stones were all undressed, but had little stones carefully placed in the crevices at the joints of the large; in order to preclude all communication between the rubbish without and the contents within. Even the tops of the erected stones were regular in height; a circumstance of nicety in such sort of architecture, that I know not to have been ever found before, and that unites with the carefulness preceding to denote the luteness of the building. On the even heads of these was laid a square freestone, which had evidently been hewn into this form, which seemed to rest with its extremities on the edges of the others, and was about eighteen or twenty inches in diameter. But the summit of the barrow rose about eight or ten feet above all; being perfect in its parts both above and below. The enclosure, however, was apparently the principal part. Yet what was repositied in it? The leveller expected to find the usual object of vulgar searchers, a pot of money. In this he was disappointed. He found, however, a dust remarkably fine, and seemingly inclining to clay. On the surface it was brown, about the middle downwards it took a dark chesnut colour, and at the bottom it approached towards a black. Nothing could be perceived in the whole, that bore any resemblance to sand; the enclosing stones having proved very faithful to their trust. What was this dust then? On stirring it up, a multitude of bones appeared, and betrayed the elements that composed it. The bones were different in the sizes, but none exceeded six or seven inches in length. Among them were some pieces about the largeness of a half-crown, which from their concave form convinced him they were the parts of a scull. The whole mass of bones and ashes, if put together for mensuration, might (he thought) be about one gallon in quantity. On touching the bones they instantly crumbled into dust, and took the same colour with the same fineness as the dust in which they were found. They were exceedingly white when they were first discovered, but remarkably brittle; the effect assuredly of their calcination in a fire, antecedent to their burial. Much in fineness and in colour with these ashes, appeared several veins of irregular earth on the outside of the enclosure; which from their position without yet adjoining, and from the space occupied by them there, he conjectured to have been bodies laid promiscuously upon the funeral pile, but which I conjecture to have been only the ashes adhering to the ground, and not possible to be separated from it, for a burial with the rest within the enclosure. They had nothing of sand in them, but seemed inclining to clay, and even more so (from the adhering soil probably) than the dust of the enclosure. And, as the workman was fully convinced of what every one else must acknowledge, that the ashes and the bones of the enclosure had once belonged to a human body, he very properly took up the whole with care, placed the stones nearly in their original posture within an hedge contiguous, then in building, placed also the bones with the ashes within their original enclosure there, and even placed the covering-stone over both. Such was the One Barrow of these downs, furnishing a decisive evidence for the true designation of a cromlech, for its having no sacrificial purpose whatever, and for its having only a funeral funeral one; as actually topped with a barrow of earth, as actually containing a stone chest within it, as actually having ashes and even bones within the chest! Nor need I to say more upon the subject than to note, that the very mausolæum of Augustus at Rome was undoubtedly what it has never been surmised to be, a barrow of earth upon a chest of stone. This intimation will undoubtedly excite the surprise of my reader. Yet it is very true. Strabo himself shall prove the point at once. “The most dignified object there,” he tells us, concerning the Campus Martius, “is what is denominated the Mausolæum, A BARROW “upon a LOFTY VAULT OF WHITE STONE, at the margin of the river, “but ALL COVERED WITH EVER-FLOURISHING TREES TO THE SUMMIT; “and on the very point above is a brazen statue of Cæsar Augustus, as “under the BARROW are the CHESTS of him, of his relations, or of his “domestics*.” This account is very explicit, and this evidence is even express. But the barrow is now gone, and only the broad girdle of stone, that bound the base of it, remains. This forms the wall of a garden, on that flat roof which once bore the barrow; and the statue of Augustus, which once crowned the summit of the barrow, is still preserved to grace the centre of the garden. Thus what was once a magnificent cromlech, with a barrow above it, like the one in Ireland and the two in Cornwall, is now contracted into a mere cromlech, like our own at St. Columb; only more artificial, more elegant, and more magnificent, being a round tall room with deep recesses in the sides.

All unites with the name of Tre-kyning near that of St. Columb, and with the reach of the Tre-kyning estate up to it. to shew a British monarch interred under a monument of stones, then lying upon the moor, or within the wood here. Others were found in 1794-5, within the fields to the north-west, almost all spars, genuine or spurious. Others again, sometimes spars, but more commonly iron-stones, were also lying even to our own times, immediately on the east. And one, equally large with the top-stone, was very lately buried there, in a pit

* Lib. v. sect. 8. Αξιολογώτατον δὲ τὸ Μαυσωλεῖον καλεσμένον, ἐπὶ κρητιδὺς ὑψηλῆς λιευκολιθεῖς πρὸς τῷ ποταμῷ ὡμα, ἀχρὶ κορυφῆς τοῖς ἀιθαλεῖσι τὰν δένδρων συνηρείς· ἐπ’ ἀκρῇ μὲν ἐν ἱκῶ, ἐστὶ χαλκῇ τῷ Σίβατον Καίσαρος· ὑπο δὲ τῷ ὡμαλί, θηκαὶ εἰσιν αὐτῆς, καὶ τῶν συγγενῶν καὶ οὐκίων, deep enough to admit the passage of a plough over it. Nor let a tomb, that, however large and massy, yet carries such a face of barbarism upon it, be thought too rude, too gross for a British sovereign in the late days of Dioclesian; too savage in its appearance, for Britons so long refined by all the arts of Rome; and competent only for such of them as were prior to the Roman settlement among us. Reason would suggest this, but fact repels the suggestion. Reason is often interposing her verdict in history, and on points of really dubious authority ought to be respectfully heard; but only exposes her own airy impertinence, when facts come forward to oppose her. Such a fact we have in a monument near Aylesford in Kent, very similar to our own, and very similarly denominated; being just such a tomb, composed (as our own was originally) of four stones, erected over the remains of Catigern the second son of Vortigern, slain here in a battle against the Saxons in 455, and popularly denominated therefore Kitt's Coty House; thus erected a century and a half after our Coyt, yet just as rude and as massy as ours, exhibiting exactly with it

The rustic grandeur, and the surly grace,

of a primæval building of the Britons*.

But

* Mr. Colebrooke, in Arch. ii. 107-117, has written about this monument, till his judgment was lost in a labyrinth. Yet Mr. Gough, in his Camden, i. 231, chooses rather to wander about with him or with Mr. Pegge, than adhere to Camden himself. In Saxon Chronicle, A. D. 455, we read, that "Hengist and Horsa fought with Vortigern the king, "at the place which is called Ægelesford," Aylesford; "and his brother Horsa was slain." This fixes the year precisely. "Secundum bellum [fuit]," says Nennius, an author all unknown to Mr. Colebrooke, "super vadum quod dicitur in linguâ eorum Episford [Elisford]; et ibi cecidit Horsa, cum filio Guorthigirn cujus nomen erat Catigirnus." (c. xlvi.) But Mr. Colebrooke says, 117, "allowed—, I think—it must be, that the Saxons remained "masters of the field;" though it certainly can never be allowed by any man that reflects on these words of Nennius, "Guortemir—Horsam, satellitem bellicosum, prostravit, cæteros-
"que in fugam versos ut stipulas terræ allidit" (c. xlv.), or on the very course of Nennius's battles preceding and subsequent, the first on the Darent, at Crayford there (Sax. Chron.), the second at Aylesford, and the third on the southern coast. (c. xlvi.) Bede also says that Horsa was killed by the Britons, and that "hactenus in orientalibus Cantiae partibus "monumentum habet," not "habuit" as in Mr. Colebrooke, 112, "suo nomine insigne." (i. 15.)

But about a mile to the east of the Coyt, on the very skirt of Castle-Dennis Moor, is a house and an estate distinguished by a name, that to a literary ear carries at once the sound and signification of Saturn's Temple. Accordingly we find this deity, the first in the parentage of the heathen gods, and the deposed father of that reputed sovereign of gods, Jupiter, retaining the appropriate appellation among the Britons, which he maintained among the Romans. Thus Sadurn (W.) is either Saturn or Saturday, and Zadarn (C.) is Saturn only. Nor was the knowledge of this god communicated by the Romans to them. His worship was transmitted equally to both, from that common source of idol deities to the world, that great fountain of the bitter waters of heathenism, which was opened upon the nations of the earth in the days of Terah. Saturn's name therefore subsists to the present day, equally in the language of the extra-provincial Irish as in that of the Cornish and Welsh; Sathairn, Sathurn, being Saturn; Satharn or Dia Sathuirn,

(i. 15.) Accordingly at Horsted, near Aylesford, is, what has been always "reputed to be" Horsæ's monument by the people of the country,—a great quantity of flint stones, which, "by length of time, and the dripping of the trees, are overgrown with moss." (Mr. Colebrooke himself, 110.) This is a mere barrow, while that is a visible cromlech; both erected at the time by the victorious Britons, that noticed by Bede, a Saxon, while this is passed over, but both unnoticed by Nennius and the Saxon Chronicle. The first who mentioned the monument of Catigern, was Camden; and he mentioned it only as from that faithful repository of local antiquities, the tradition of the country. "Ceciderunt hœc prælio," he cried, "duces partium, Catigernus Britannus et Horsæ Saxo, quorum hic ad Horsted non procul hinc sepultus loco nomen reliquit ille magnifico elatus funere contumelatus creditur prope Ailesford, ubi vasta illa saxa erecta sunt, quæ imperitum vulgus," men not led astray by the false lights of learning, "a Catigerno Keith Coty-house hodie vocat." (Edit. 1590, p. 248; edit. 1594, p. 245.) In vain therefore has Mr. Colebrooke attempted, with Mr. Pegge and Mr. Gough for his auxiliaries, to wrest this monument from Camden and from history. The arm of a giant could not wrest it. The arm of an infant, the arms of many infants combined, could not move one of these stones out of its place. The site agrees exactly with the battle, tradition concurs precisely with history, and the barrow of Horsæ unites with the cromlech of Catigern, to appropriate all with uncommon decisiveness.

See also another author in Arch. xi. 38-41, who has written, like Mr. Colebrooke, without thinking.

At Kitt's Coty-house the covering-stone is a good deal less than the covering-stone at the Coyt, in weight; this being that of but fourteen tons, and that only ten tons seven hundreds. (Borlase, 224.)

Saturday,

Saturday, in Irish *. So thoroughly were our British ancestors acquainted with the name, through all the kingdoms of Britain and Ireland! The best and the worst of judges have accordingly united, in interpreting TRE-SADARNE, the name of a house in four or five parts of Cornwall, into Saturn's Temple. Mr. Hals notices our own, near St. Columb, thus, "Tre-saddarne, that is to say, God Saturn's Town, a place where the god Saturn was worshipped by the heathen soldiers [of Castle-Dennis], who probably had their temple or chapel there before Christianity †." Dr. Borlase also mentions Zadarn, Saturn, inde "Trezadarn, Town of Saturn ‡;" having previously inserted Saturn, among the objects of British idolatry §. And with all this collateral support from the appearance of the god's name in so many of the British dialects, the appellation of Tre-sadarn plainly points at a building; not indeed a "town," as the Cornish are so unthinkingly prone to interpret their own Tre, thus catching the secondary idea of the word before the primary, the derivative meaning antecedently to the original; but merely a "house" appropriated to the god, and standing formerly on the site. Buildings vanish, but appellations remain; and these frequently come at last to be the only memorials of those. With such a memorial of a temple of Saturn formerly existing here, we see Tre-

* So Sathairn (Erse) is Saturday, and Sadorn (Armoric) is either Saturday or Saturn. All this shews us the folly of Pryce, who acknowledges no Saturn in the Cornish language, though expressly acknowledged by Borlase, and though appearing so evidently in the collateral British of Wales, of Ireland, of Scotland, or of Bretagné; who therefore interprets Tre Sadarn as Tre Cadarn, the strong house; and so ventures upon an etymology, that bespeaks its own reprobation. But "Llan Saturn," alias "Llansadwrn" (Rowlands, 351), the name of a parish-church, within the Isle of Anglesey, is merely what Leland interprets it, the church of "S. Saturnus aut Saturninus" (Coll. iv. 90). The saint's real name indeed is Saturnus. He is expressly mentioned in the Life of St. Wenefrid, who "Henth-laut petiit ubi habitabat S. Saturnus; verba Saturni ad Wenefredam," &c. (Leland's Itin. iv. 137, 138.) He was a saint of Wales, and has therefore lent his name to a church in Wales.

† Hals, 64.

‡ Borlase, 464.

§ Borlase, 172: "We have—some reason to think them [rocks] dedicated to Saturn;—for we have many places in Cornwall called Tre-sadarn—, and we have Nan-sadarn, "or the Valley of Saturn."

kyning

kyning, Tre-sadarn, and the Coyt, all uniting together to mark the establishment of heathenism, near the town of St. Columb; to shew us a heathen king residing at the first, worshipping at the second, and lying intombed at the third. Yet Saturn in all probability derived his name from that FATHER GOD of all the heathen idolatry, when the heathens “sacrificed to devils and not to GOD†:” even him, who like Saturn was the head and sovereign of all the devils, and was actually named so like him, as amid all the variations of languages, and with all the terminations of names, to be only transnominated from SATAN into SATURN; this confessed son of Cælus and Terra, this earth-fallen angel of heaven retaining his appropriate name of Satan, or the enemy to the last; while his more ambitious son, the usurper of his father’s throne, and even the maimer of his father’s person, arrogated to himself the very appellation of GOD, and was denominated Jehovah or Jove. Such were the principal divinities of heathenism, all of them devils, and one of them, the arch-devil, acknowledging himself by name to be Satan!

The king of Cornwall then, the immediate predecessor of Solomon, but a Pagan himself, and a resident in the royal house of Tre-kyning, in consequence of Dioclesian’s edict probably, ordered a young woman of the Roman name of Columba to be put to death for her Christianity. The scene of the execution he directed to be north of his own house, behind the hill that backs it on the north, and upon the very site of the present churchyard; ground sufficiently distant from his house, not to annoy his feelings with either the sight or the hearing of the deed during its transaction, yet rising higher than any immediately adjacent, even looking down into a steep valley on the north, and conspicuous from all the high lands beyond. Here the fatal fire was kindled, I suppose, casting its awful gleam upon the sides of the hills opposite, and carrying a strong terror with it to the heart of every secret but cowardly Christian*.

Here,

† 1 Cor. x. 20.

* Fire appears to have been then a common implement of martyrdom. So Bede says of the Sancta Columba of France, that, “superato igne casa est” (p. 460), when the fire could not dispatch her a weapon did. So likewise we find fire used in Polycarp’s martyrdom

Here, too, was seen, I suppose, the virgin saint of Christianity, already a confessor, soon to be a martyr, looking down with a smile upon all that earth and hell could inflict, as eager to pass on the wings of hovering angels to the peculiar blessedness of martyrs in eternity. The flames encircled her, her body was consumed to ashes, and her soul flew undoubtedly with all the vigour of that eagle, which at the burning of the dead body of a Roman emperor was dismissed from the funeral pile “to mount with the fire into the sky, to carry the soul of the emperor from earth to heaven, and so to begin his deification among men*.” She thus became deservedly deified so far among the Christians as to have her memory revered in solemn sadness, and her name pronounced with religious rapture for a peculiar saint of the Gospel; for one of the highest of all saints—a martyr; for one upon whom Christianity had shewed its strongest powers of magnetism, in raising her sublimely above the earth, and in attracting her to her kindred spirits in paradise. In a few years afterward her religion became the religion of the empire itself. Cornwall was broken into those divisions called parishes, which are so familiar to our minds as divisions formed for the sake of religion, but which were never formed for any religion except the Christian; an extensive region here was thrown into one of them, and the church of it was naturally fixed upon the very ground on which its own martyr had suffered: so the church of St. Alban was built on the scene of his martyrdom as soon as ever the persecution ceased†. The individual spot here, as at St. Alban’s, was assuredly within the walls of the church, while the place of sepulture for her (Russel’s Patres Apostolici, 344, 348, 350, 354); but what brings his death to a near conformity with hers, the fire becomes subdued, and he is therefore slain with a sword (p. 354, 355). See also Eusebius’s Hist. viii. 6, 8, 13; De Martyr. Pal. 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 431, 433, for fire so used.

* Herodian, iv. p. 156, 157; Edinburgh, 1724: ἄετος ἀφίεται, συν τῇ πυρὶ ἀνιλευσόμενος ἵνα τοὶ ἀδελφοὶ οἱ φέροντες ἀπὸ γῆς εἰς οὐρανοὺς τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως ψυχὴν πείσυνται ὑπὸ τῶν Ῥωμαίων· καὶ ἐξ ἐκείνου μέγα τῶν λοιπῶν θίων θρησκευόμενοι. See also Montfaucon, v. pt. 1st, iv. 9, plate 31, figures 3, xi. plate 32, fig. 2, where an eagle is bearing the soul of an emperor to heaven.

† Bede, i. 7: “Redeunte temporum serenitate.”

remains

remains, as for St. Alban's, was at a little distance without †; but her name was certainly affixed to the whole, like his. A representation of her is known to have been carved in stone formerly upon the ends of the roof, and other representations appear to have been painted upon the glass of the windows, in which she (with a Roman allusion to her name) carried a Columba or dove in her hands §.

The saint of this church, therefore, must be acknowledged by all, though she is wholly unnoticed by Dr. Borlase as a martyr for Christianity among the Cornish; as a virgin put to death for the Gospel by the heathen king of Cornwall; as, indeed, one grand evidence of druidical malignity, impelled however by the malignity of a man who was noways druidical himself, even Dioclesian, against the glorious followers of our Redeemer. She has thus the honour of standing conspicuously forward upon the shores of Cornwall; that host of martyrs with which ignorance has crowded those shores, all vanishing away at her presence like ghosts before the rising day, and she herself appearing robed in the brightest beams of the sun. Yet she stands not alone; she is accompanied on her right hand and on her left with other martyrs, though none of them are Dr. Borlase's; all suffering assuredly in the same persecution, as, from the equal recentness of their sufferings, the lives of some of them were written equally with hers, and as they were all the children of one pair of parents.

Leland selects the following notice from a life of St. Nectan, now, like that of Sancta Columba, I believe, lost for ever to the curious world: "Brechan," cries the biographer, "a little king in Wales, from whom the district of Brecknock took its name, had by his wife Gladwise twenty-four sons and daughters, whose names were Nectan, John,

† The body of St. Alban appears repositied without the church, "sub ce-pite absconditum;" and carried thence by Offa "in quandam ecclesiam ibidem extra urbem Verulamium, in honorem beati martyris constructam." (M. Paris, 904.) But the spot on which he was martyred was within the church, as the church was built "ubi martyr, percussus, sanguinem suum fudit pro Christo." (Ibid. ibid.)

§ Hals, 62.

“ Endelient, Menfre, and Dilie; Tedda, Maben, Weneu, and Wensent; Merewenna, Wenna, Juliana, and Yse; Morwenna, Wymp, Wenheder, Cleder, and Keri; Jona, Kanauc, Kerhender, Adwen, Helic, and Tamalane. All these sons and daughters were afterwards “ holy martyrs or confessors, in Devonshire and Cornwall, living the “ life of hermits *.” Giraldus Cambrensis, who took his journey through Wales in the end of the twelfth century, relates the very same incident, with some slight variations and some useful additions, thus: “ There “ was anciently,” says this traveller, the earliest tour-maker which we have in all the island, and the father of that long line of writers which has afforded such entertainment of late to the very indolence of amusement, seeking indulgence in reading itself, “ within that region which “ is called Brecknock, a man powerful and noble for the ruler of it, “ whose name was Brachan, and from whom the land also was denominated Brecknock, of whom this seems memorable, that the British chronicles testify him to have had twenty-four [sons and] daughters, “ all from their youth given up to acts of obsequiousness to God, and “ happily terminating their lives in adherence to their adopted sanctity, “ as there are yet many large churches in Wales distinguished by their names. Of these one is in the district of Brecknock, not far from the “ head castle of Aberhodni, placed upon the top of a certain hill, but “ called the church of Sancta Almadha: for this had been the name of “ the holy virgin who, even there, rejecting the marriage of an earthly “ king, and marrying herself to the King Eternal, triumphed in a happy “ martyrdom. Her solemn day is celebrated in the same place every “ year, on the first of August, where, on the same day also, numbers

† Leland's Coll. iv. 153: “ Ex Vitâ S. Nectani. ‘ Brechanus, regulus Walliæ, a quo “ Broechanoe provincia nomen sumpsit, ex Gladwisâ uxore viginti quatuor filios et filias “ genuit, quorum hæc sunt nomina: Nectanus, Joannes, Endelient, Menfre, Dilie; Tedda, “ Maben, Weneu, Wensent; Merewenna, Wenna, Juliana, Yse; Morwenna, Wymp, “ Wenheder, Cleder, Keri; Jona, Kanauc, Kerhender, Adwen, Helic, Tamalane. Omnes “ isti filii et filiæ postea fuerunt sancti martyres vel confessores, in Devonîa et Cornubiâ, “ vitam heremiticam agentes’.”

“ of the common people usually assemble together from distant parts*.” But William of Worcester, writing from the very calendar of the church at Mount St. Michael in Cornwall, even repeating the same story with new additions, very usefully recites the names thus, and so gives us a second security for rectitude in a point peculiarly exposed to errors: “ Nectan, John, Sudebrent, Menfrede, and Delyan; Tetha, Maben, “ Wentu, and Wensent; Marwenna, Wenna, Julliana, and Yse; Morwenna, Wymip, Wenheden, Cleder, and Kery; Jona, Heley, Lanant, “ Rerhender, Adwen-helye [Adwen Helye] and Tamalant†.” In this narrative there is some incredibility of matter, from the extraordinary nature of the whole; and an additional incredibility in the manner, from a variation of circumstances in the three relaters. Yet here we have one of those cases in which scepticism is compelled to fly before evidence, and history triumphs over incredibility. The first account is given by that best of all authorities, the biographer of St. Nectan; this receives what it does not want, a supplemental authority, from the particularity of its notices, and the specification of its names: it is again

* Camden's Anglica, &c. 826: “ Erat autem antiquitus regionis illius quæ Brechineoc “ dicitur, dominator vir potens et nobilis, cui nomen Brachanus, a quo et terra Brecheinoc “ denominata est, et de quo mihi notabile videtur, quòd ipse [ipsum] 24 habuisse filias “ historiæ Britannicæ testantur, omnes a pueritiâ divinis deditas obsequiis, et in sanctitatis “ assumptæ proposito vitam feliciter terminâsse. Extant autem adhuc basilicæ per Cam“ briam multæ, earum nominibus illustratæ; quarum una in provinciâ de Brecheinoc, non “ procul a castro principali de Aberhodni, in collis ejusdam vertice sita, quæ Sanctæ “ Almedhæ ecclesia dicitur, hoc etenim virginis sanctæ nomen extiterat, quæ et ibidem “ terreni regis nuptias respuens, Abterno nubens Regi, fælici martyrio triumphavit. Cele“ bratur autem sollemnis ejusdem dies eòdem in loco, singulis annis, in capite Cal. Augusti, “ ubi, et eòdem die, multi de plebe longinquis ex partibus convenire solent.” She is also noticed by William of Worcester thus, with a little variation of the name: “ Sancta Elevetha, “ virgo et martir, una 24 filiarum reguli de Brechaynoke in Walliâ—, jacet [in] ecclesiâ “ monialium virginum vilke de Usque, et fuit martirizata super montem per annum militare “ de Brekenok,—et lapis ubi decapitabatur ibi remanet.” (Worcestre, 158.) “ Sancta “ Elevetha, virgo, jacet in ecclesiâ apud Usque.” P. 160.)

† W. de Worcester, 129, 130: “ Nectanus, Johannes, Sudebrent, Menfrede, Delyan; “ Tetha, Maben, Wentu, Wensent, Marwenna, Wenna, Julliana, Yse; Morwenna, “ Wymip, Wenheden, Cleder, Kery; Jona, Heley, Lanant, Rerhender, Adwenhelve, “ Tamalant.”

corroborated

corroborated in its general import by the testimony of Giraldus, his cited evidence of British chronicles, and the Cornish calendar at Mount St. Michael. But it is finally confirmed beyond all reach of doubt by the remaining liveliness of many of the names in the parishes of Cornwall, where many of the persons are here said to have lived hermits, and to have died confessors or martyrs; where, therefore, all the names could not be recorded, Devonshire having a right to several, and Cornwall claiming only the rest.

The first or principal of these, the first on the list as the eldest of them all, or the principal in our eyes, because his life gives us the original account of all, Nectan, was one of those who settled in Devonshire as a hermit, was honoured in Devonshire as a saint, and had even a church erected in Devonshire with his name to it. He was buried at Hartland, and at Hartland a church was constructed bearing the name of St. Nectan; originally collegiate for secular priests, afterwards conventual for Austin canons, but now robbed of all its possessions, reduced into a mere donative, yet still glorying in its relation to St. Nectan*.

JOHN, however, took up his residence in Cornwall, and in a parish that has been denominated from him. Its assumption of his name, however, has been so much disguised to the critical eye by a variation in the orthography, proper in itself, but concealing the identity, that, had we not been led by the history, we should have searched in vain for the origin: John being a Welshman, his name must have been written in his native language Jeuan, or Jevan, or Evan†. We have accordingly a parish-church in our deanery of East, which is called "Ecclesia Sancti Ivonis" in the earlier Valor, but St. Ives in the later, or St. Eve in popular pronunciation, and is well known by tradition

* Leland's Coll. iv. 153: "S. Nectanus—Hartlandiæ sepultus." (Tanner and Bacon.)

† Richards's Welsh Dictionary.

among the parishioners to have derived its name from the British appellation of John ‡.

ENDELIENT retired to another part of Cornwall, and gave name to another parish within it: this name is echoed back from the parish, without the slightest variation in the repetition. Thus, in the deanery of Trigge Minor, we find "Ecclesia Sanctæ Endelientæ," specified by the first Valor; then a church collegiate of four prebendaries, now the rectory of St. Endelien, with three prebends detached from it. And from the entry of the name in that Valor we learn, what we could not learn from either Giraldus's account, Williams's Catalogue, or St. Neetan's Life, the sex of this saint.

MENFREDE, } Appears from the same evidence to have been equally MENFRE, } a daughter, and to have equally taken up her abode in Cornwall: she settled in a parish immediately adjoining to her sister's. In the first Valor, directly before St. Endelien, we see "Ecclesia Sanctæ Minviredæ" noted; in the last we see it noted with a nearer conformity to the second appellation, "Mynfray, alias Mynforde, alias St. Miniver;" as in a calendar belonging once to the monastic church of Bodmin, we find the day of "Sancta Menefreda, virgin, not martyr, on the 24th of November *."

TETHA, } Appears equally a daughter, and fixed her hermitage in the TEDDA, } parish immediately adjoining to St. Endelien's; the three sisters ranging in a line along the sea, but at a little distance from it, east and west. Immediately after the church of St. Endelien in the first Valor, we have "Ecclesia Sanctæ Thethæ," a collegiate church of two prebendaries, now St. Tethe, a mere vicarage. It thus shared the common fate of almost all collegiate churches, their opulence marking them out for plunder, and their reduction now being in proportion to their great-‡ Hals, 116: "As the parishioners tell us, St. Eve is a corruption of St. Ivonis in British, i. e. John."

* W. de Worcester, 108: "Sancta Menefreda, virgo, non martir, die 24 Novembris."

ness before, reformation paring off all, that the grossest selfishness of worldly avarice would pronounce superfluous in the ministeries of religion, and so contracting the plump body into a naked skeleton. But, in this contraction, some colleges shared a different fate from others; St. Tethe's church shrivelling up into a vicarage, while St. Endelien's continued a rectory; because the anatomical knife of sacrilege, I believe, shrunk in fear at times from too keen an abscision.

MABEN fixed another hermitage a little to the south of all, and appears to have been one more of the daughters. We have accordingly in the same Valor, even under the same deanery, "Ecclesia Sanctæ Mabenæ," now the rectory of St. Mabyn near Wadebridge.

MARWENNA, } However, went away from the neighbourhood of MEREWENNA, } her sisters, in a spirit, probably, of stronger abstraction from the world with all its ties, yet still kept within the confines of Cornwall. She went up into that angular part on the north-east, which was subdued by the Saxons long before the rest of the country, by its peninsular kind of separation from it, as it exhibits a much greater number of Saxon appellations for places than any other district of Cornwall, and indeed has hardly any Cornish left within it at present. There, under the deanery of Trigge Major in the first Valor, we meet with "Ecclesia de Marwentchurche," or "Marewen church," as the name is differently given by the Cottonian and by Spelman's manuscripts; but find it denominated "Marham church" in the last Valor, though dedicated to "St. Marvenne."

WENNA, equally a daughter, rested behind all her sisters, as I suppose the landing to have been made at Padstow, the old port of passage from Ireland, the most commodious too from Wales, and set up her pilgrim's staff a little to the east of St. Columb. There, in the deanery of Pyder, one Valor points out "Ecclesia Sanctæ Wennæ," as the other gives us "Wen, alias Wenman," that is, Wenn's Place; mann still signifying place in Welsh, once signifying it therefore in Cornish, and this church at Wenn's Place being actually dedicated to St. Wenne.

A little to the north of her, about midway between her and St. Minver, with only that tide-river the Camel or Alan interposing betwixt them, rested YSE: but whether this saint was a son or a daughter I cannot tell. The record that has hitherto ascertained the sex here fails us; the sexual terminations of words in Latin not lending us any light now, because either the parish is omitted, as then making a part of another, or it is mentioned under its secular, and not its sainted name. Nor can the other Valor assist us, denominating the church "St. Esye, " alias Isye, alias Ithy," but concealing the sex under the ambiguity of the English language.

Yet MORWENNA went away with her sister of nearly the same appellation, Merewenna or Marwenna, into the contracted angle of Cornwall on the north-east. There, some miles to the north of Marham church, and at the apex of the angle, we have what is denominated by the first Valor, without any express specification of the saint, yet with a secret reference to her, "Ecclesia de Morewystow;" in the encroachments of the Saxon upon the Cornish of this peninsula, the parish having adopted the name of its saint with a Saxon word like Padstow for its own name, and so being denominated Morewyn's Stow or Place. We thus see it equally denominated "Morwinstow" in the last, and know it to be dedicated to "St. Morwenna;" and as Morwenna went to the very point of the angle of Cornwall, so Nectan, her elder brother, passed into the adjoining part of Devonshire, even up to Hartland there.

CLEDER appears to have been a son, and to have taken his stand much more to the south than either of these two sisters, only a few miles to the east of his sister Tedda or Tetha. There we find in the first Valor, "Ecclesia de Cledery," as the name is read in the Cotton MS. but "Ecclesia Sancti Cledredi," as it is more specifically read in Spelman's; yet the "Cleder" of the second Valor is known to be dedicated to St. Clether, being popularly denominated St. Clether itself at present.

KERI retired a little to the east of St. Clether, I suppose, and HELLID staid in the vicinity of St. Mabyn, I apprehend. In the deanery of Trigge Major, the first Valor exhibits “Capella de Egloskery,” or “Egloskery,” and the second the curacy of “Egloskorry,” now denominated “Egloskerry,” yet so denominated as the church of Keri. That Valor equally exhibits “Ecclesia de Eglosheil,” and this the vicarage of “Egloshele;” a name in which the personal appellation of the saint, and the Cornish term for a church, are equally as in the former incorporated together, to constitute the common title of the church and parish; but of which the literal signification, when it is reduced to its constituent parts again, is merely the church of Hele or Helie*.

ADWEN settled very near to St. Teth, and a little on the east: there we have the parish of “Advent,” now dedicated to “St. Adven,” but united with “Lanteglos juxta Camelford.” This “is called Advent,” cries poor Mr. Hals, who commenced his course of Sisyphean toil with this parish, “from Advent Sunday (on which probably it was consecrated and dedicated to God, in the name of St. Anne, by the bishop of Exon), viz. the nearest to the feast of St. Andrew, and refers to “the coming of Christ, Advent being derived from the Latin word “adventus, a coming or arrival;” and, as the sentence ran originally because it now runs in the manuscript, before the publisher presumed to curtail and change it in printing, “Advent pro adveniat, synonymous “with προσερχομαι, proserchomai, adveniens, answerable to the Hebrew “בא approinquo, to approach or to arrive, to draw near.” I thus exhibit Mr. Hals, with all his erudition (as he thought it) waving in a crest of honour upon his head, and really (as my reader will think) with his cock’s-comb cap of folly pricking up its asses ears at the sides. What the name of the parish means is very obvious to common sense; however Mr. Hals in his learning may be puzzled to discover it: the appellation is merely personal, and that of the church’s saint, and I have pointed out the very person who bore it†.

* Jona, I suspect, had a chapel at Lan-yon, in Gwincar parish; Lan-yon naturally meaning the church of Jona.

† William reads “Adven-helye” as one name, because he has interpolated “Helie” before, and would otherwise have had one saint too many for his number.

But

But we have one name more to be appropriated; what is written “Kananc” in Leland, being LANANT in William. This is the name of a parish at present, which we have colloquially corrupted into La/ant; which we had so corrupted long enough before Henry’s Valor, for the Valor itself to adopt the false appellation, but which is written in its original orthography by the earlier Valor, as “Ecclesia de Lananta.” From the termination of this, too, the saint appears to have been a female, who settled more to the west than any of her brothers or sisters, and lent her name to that church, which carried afterwards as a prefix the appellation of another saint, Uny, who lived and died in the parish at a later period*.

We thus find very many of these sainted names still resounding in Cornwall, still affixed to our churches, and still retained by our parishes: the others have either been lost in the lapse of ages since, or have their names disguised to us by false readings, or are referrible to Devonshire entirely. All of these saints, says the primary narrative above, were either confessors or martyrs for Christianity in Cornwall and in Devonshire. Nectan we particularly know to have been a martyr; but then he was a martyr where he was buried, at Hartland, in Devonshire†. Others

* “Ewny, alias Uny, Lalant cum S. Jesse, alias S. Ives.” (Henry’s Valor.)

† Leland’s Coll. iv. 153: “Nectanus martyr Hartlandiæ sepultus.” William, 130, 131, speaks thus of Nectan: “Sicut—primogenitus fuit, ita cæteris omnibus honestate vitæ major fuit, et prodigiorum choruscatæ excellentior, extitit.—Venerandus vir Nectanus, “per quæque nemorosa,” plunging into all the thick parts of the woodland, “dispendia “investigando querere,” seeking and searching out the circuitous ways in it, as flying from persecutors, “ab iis repertus latronibus,” was at last discovered by the cut-throats who were in quest of him, “in loco qui adhuc hodie dicitur Nova Villa,” Newton, “ibi jam “ecclesia in ejus honorem construitur,” a mere chapel, I presume, “15 kal. Julii capite “truncatus est; et caput suum propriis accipiens manibus, per medium ferme spaciū stadiū,” for half a furlong, “usque ad fontem quo morabatur,” which is at the abbey, I believe, and from which he had plunged into the thick parts of the wood, “detulerit; “ibique sanguine [sanguineo] circumlinitum sudori,” bedewed all over with a sweat of blood, “cuiusdam lapidi imposuit; cujus adhuc cordis et miraculi, sanguinolenta in eodem “lapide remanent vestigia.” These marks probably were made at first, in mere commemoration of the traditionary incident, and were afterwards appealed to in the forgetfulness of ignorance as proofs of its truth.

of them were equally martyrs in Cornwall. His or their martyrdom, therefore, proves not the later establishment of Christianity in Cornwall than in Devonshire, proves indeed the equal non-establishment of it at the time in both; and proves the druidism of Devonshire, if druidism had been primarily concerned in the business, to have been just as malignant to the Gospel as the druidism of Cornwall. Giraldus also shews us a sister to all these saints, even in the Welsh principality of her and their father, put to death by a king whose honourable suit she had rejected, and so made a martyr for the Gospel in Wales. * They all therefore came into Cornwall, probably on the murder of their sister, certainly at a period when Christianity was both professed and persecuted; professed by some, but persecuted by others; professed by the little king of Brecknockshire, but persecuted from a personal dislike to one individual by a superior sovereign. This persecution had begun in a paroxysm of rage, and burst out into the martyrdom of the king's daughter; but probably was extending its rage and directing its bursts steadily against her sisters or brothers, all equally Christian with herself, all involved certainly in her religion, all sharing probably by imputation in her rejection of the king. They therefore agreed to leave Wales together, to retire into Cornwall, so to fly beyond the reach of the murderous tyrant. They thus retired to exercise that religion in the solitude of a separate hermitage, which they could not exercise together in the palace of their father. They retired from Wales at a period when the Christians of Roman Britain, as Gildas informs us, had many churches constructed for the public rites of devotion; they became martyrs or confessors in Cornwall and Devonshire, when those churches were levelled to the ground; they were sainted, and had churches erected to their memory when Christianity was again tolerated, was soon encouraged, and was speedily established*. They thus differ essentially from all the hermits that we have seen before: those were protected or patronised by the kings or nobles of Cornwall, all of them now Christians; while these were seized by the heathen hand of power, were dragged to prison, were probably sentenced to death, and some of them actually put to death. They thus became confessors or martyrs at the closing persecution of the Christian church, when the malignant spirits of earth or hell made their last efforts, and lavished all their arts of violence in one last exertion to crush the genius of a religion for ever, that derived a flame of animation from the very fires of heaven itself, that therefore rose strong under the heaviest weight of human or diabolical oppression, and was always aspiring to mingle with those fires again from which it originally came.

* Gildas, c. viii.: "Renovant ecclesias ad solum usque destructas, basilicas sanctorum " martyrum fundant, construunt, perficiunt."

So high are we carried by this singular train of anecdotes, which has hitherto lain unnoticed amid the dust and cobwebs of antiquarian literature, in the history of our religion among the Cornish! We have beheld it patronised where Dr. Borlase imagined it to be persecuted; we have found it persecuted where Dr. Borlase did not suppose it to exist; yet persecuted only when it was also persecuted in Devonshire, when indeed it was persecuted all over the Roman empire. We particularly perceive in this royal family of Wales, in this glorious household of Welsh confessors and martyrs, the names of many of those saints whose memories we are yearly celebrating in our parish-feasts, and whose appellations we are daily pronouncing in those of our parishes, without knowing who, or when, or whence they were. Most of them were Irish we now see, many of them Welsh, but some Cornish; holy men, holy women, sons or daughters of kings; devout hermits, religious prelates, even pious kings themselves; renouncing the world for religion, resigning their lives for their faith, and rejecting earth for heaven; but so rejecting or so resigning merely at the finishing period of persecution, and so renouncing under the establishment of Christianity in the isle as a part of the empire, though a couple of centuries afterward. That happy leaven of the world, Christianity, was long struggling to ferment the mass of the empire, by slow degrees subdued a part of its natural heaviness, but at last diffused her quickening influence very successfully through the whole*.

* “St. Kayne,” says Dr. Borlase, “or Keyna, a holy virgin of the blood royal, daughter “of Braganus prince of Brecknockshire, is said to have gone a pilgrimage to St. Michael’s “Mount,

“Mount, in Cornwall. (Carew, p. 130; Capgrave, p. 204; Willis Not. p. 103.) Now “this saint lived in the end of the fifth century, and as she probably dwelt in the eastern “part of this county (where her church and well are still to be seen, and her festival is celebrated on the 30th of September), it is not at all improbable that she should come this “pilgrimage to St. Michael’s Mount; a fact farther confirmed by the legend of St. Cadoc “(though disfigured by fable), who, according to Capgrave (fol. liv. and ccv.), made a “pilgrimage to St. Michael’s Mount, there saw and conversed with St. Kayne; and on his “return, parched with thirst, miraculously produced a most plentiful and healing fountain “in a dry place, and had a church dedicated to him in Cornwall, where this miracle was “performed.” But where in Cornwall this church is, Dr. Borlase knew not himself, I believe, and I long found myself all unable to say, knowing no church at all of his name within the county, knowing only St. Cadoc in St. Veep, and St. Cadoc in Padstow parishes, at both which was certainly a chapel dedicated to him. The latter, however, is meant, as William says thus: “Sanctus Cradokus [Cadokus] est honoratus in ecclesiâ capellæ prope “Patistow in comitatu de Cornewaylle, propter vermes destruendos bilendo aquæ fontis ibidem,” not for opening a well, but for freeing it from worms; “from which it appears that “this place” St. Michael’s Mount “was dedicated to religion at least as anciently as the latter “end of the fifth century.” (P. 385, 386.) The conduct of the argument here is wonderful; first referring to mere report for the pilgrimage of St. Kayne, afterwards denominating it a fact, and finally confirming it by another report from the very same quarter, Capgrave, the relator of both legends. But the grand absurdity of this passage lies in its direct and positive contradiction to what the Doctor has said before in this often-cited passage of p. 368, that “in “the remote corners of the island druidism had taken deep root, and it would not give way “to weak efforts; hence it is that after the Roman empire, and much the greatest part of “Britain, had been Christian, we find many martyrs suffering death in Cornwall for the “Christian faith; and hence it is that in the latter end of the fourth, during all the fifth, “and most part of the sixth centuries, we find so many holy men employed to convert the “Cornish to the Christian religion.” Yet now we find St. Michael’s Mount “dedicated to “religion at least as anciently as the latter end of the fifth.” We thus close all the errors of Dr. Borlase concerning the first establishment of Christianity in Cornwall, with a contradiction to them from a fact as alleged by himself, direct, comprehensive, and sweeping.

The whole allegation, however, is merely a mass of falsehoods, created only by a confusion of names, and refuted by the evidence of history. Was indeed St. Kayne the “daughter of Braganus prince of Brecknockshire,” she must have lived (as in the text I have shewn the sons and daughters of Brachanus to have lived) in the beginning of the fourth: so much more contradictory to all his hypothesis would this alleged fact be! But she was certainly no daughter of his; all of them that came into Cornwall being enumerated by name in the life of St. Nectan a real son, and no such daughter occurring in the list. She was in truth the daughter of Brethonus king of Wales, not Brachanus king of Brecknockshire: she went also into Somersetshire, not Cornwall, and took up her residence there, not here. There also St. Cadoc, who was her nephew by his mother’s side, and the son of a king of South-Wales, actually buried her. “Ex Vitâ S. Gundlei Regis. “Gundeleus “filii regis Australium Britonum. Gundeleus ex Gladusâ uxore Cadocum genuit. Obiit Gundeleus juxta ecclesiam quam construxerat; presente Dubritio episcopo Landuensi;” consequently long after the days of Brachanus king of Brecknockshire, even nearly two centuries after, as Dubricius died in November 522 (Richardson’s Godwin, 572-591), “et Cadoco, 4 Cal. Aprilis.” (Leland’s Itin. viii. 53.) “Ex Vita S. Keinæ. ‘Keina Bre-thani filia. Keineuir, id est, Keina virgo,’” Gwryf (W.) being a virgin still, “‘locos ubi Keina habitabat serpentibus liberavit,’” &c.: the margin says, “Keinesham,” and “‘Cadocus materteram suam Keinam sepelivit,’” at “‘ecclesia Caine a Danis vastata.’” (Ibid. 53, 54.) We thus conclude the fables of Dr. Borlase concerning the first establishment of Christianity in Cornwall, with one fable detached from the rest, incidental in its introduction, but crowning in its detection.
“filius

Nor is the Doctor’s reference to Carew one iota more satisfactory than his appeal to Willis or to Capgrave. Carew speaks of St. Kayne’s Well, not Willis’s, near the mouth of the eastern Loo, not even another in the parish of St. Kaine higher up this current, but a third at Trekue or Trekieve, about a mile to the north of St. Clere’s church. (Norden, 86, his and great map.) Yet Dr. Borlase, by his mode of appeal equally to Carew and to Willis, has fixed both the last and the first, though so distant from each other, to be the very well at which “she probably dwelt in the eastern part of this county:” by his speaking, however, of “her church and well,” as still “to be seen” there, and of “her festival,” as “celebrated” there “on the 30th of September,” he again settles her well with Willis specifically at St. Martin’s. The fact is, that he was confounded in the topography of this his native county, fancied the three wells to be all one; even imagined St. Martin’s near Loo, because denominated with an alias St. Kayne’s to be St. Kaine’s near Leskard. But he suffered himself to be led into this confusion by adopting the very natural ignorance of a stranger to the county, and taking all Willis’s aberrations without a moment’s thought into his own work.

Yet, as Dr. Borlase has referred to Carew, let me wind up this long note with another proof of the Doctor’s absurd reference to him: “I will relate you,” says this topographer in a very remarkable passage, “another of the Cornish natural wonders, viz. St. Kayne’s Well;—not Kayne the manqueller, but one of a gentler spirit and milder sex, to wit, a woman. He who caused the spring to be pictured,” in some drawing (I suppose) then shewed at the well, “added this rime for an exposition:

“*In name, in shape, in quality,
 “ This well is very quaint;

 “ The quality, that man or wife,
 “ Whose chance or choice attaines
 “ First of this sacred stream to drinke, “ Thereby THE MASTRY GAINES.”*

A well endowed with such a quality as this, either settles or precludes at once all matrimonial disputes about power, and is the peculiar felicity of our own county; but what enhances the blessing greatly, not one husband of Cornwall has been known for a century past to take advantage of the quality, and so secure his sovereignty for ever. Dr. Borlase, we see indeed, did not even know where it was; but other antiquaries have known, and antiquaries, perhaps, want more than most men to maintain their husbandly prerogatives by so easy an expedient, yet not even a single antiquary has presumed to drink of this matrimonial Helicon: I might have been near it, but forbore to visit it; the advantage is generously resigned up to our wives, and the daughters of St. Keina reign in every family. Cornwall is thus a Martigny upon a grander scale, and Dr. Borlase has levelled one of the most extraordinary wells in the world, the happiness and the honour of Cornwall, to a mere fountain of common waters, near Loo, near Leskard, or near any other church in Cornwall.

CHAPTER SIXTH.

SECTION I.

I HAVE now levelled to the ground that strange and Gothic line of frontier which the hand of Dr. Borlase had thrown up against the inroads of Christianity, and for the defence of druidism as the exclusive heathenism of Cornwall. The Cornish became Christians with the other Britons of the north and west; were with the others polluted by that “detestable heresy” of Arianism, but cured by the vigorous operations of the Council of Nice; were afterwards with the others infected by the proud folly of Pelagianism, yet again cured by the coming, and by the preaching, of Germanus. He went into Wales, he came into Cornwall to complete his work; he went to king Benli in Wales*, and he came to king Theodore or Tewydor, probably in Cornwall, then residing at a royal house, assuredly in the present parish of St. German’s. Yet

* Nennius, c. xxx.: “Rex—cui nomen erat Benli, in regione Jal.” In Denbighshire and the vale of Clwyd, “Moel Benlli, or Tennli’s Hill is a strong British post, probably “possessed by the chieftain of that name mentioned by Ninnius.” (Gough, ii. 586.) This fortress may seem at first not to agree with the description, as Nennius speaks of Germanus’s arrival “ad ostium urbis,” and calls it “urbs” twice afterwards: but, as he also calls it “arx,” the other name must be considered to mean only a castle. It was, however, “in regione Jal,” which is now a mountainous tract of Denbighshire, having its name properly preserved in Gibson only (c. 820, with his map), and disguised into Yale in Leland’s Itin. v. 35; Camden, 547; Gough, ii. 583: it is now not far from Moel Benlli, and then enclosed it probably. All was in Powis-land, Nennius speaking of it as in the “regio Povisorum” (c. xxxiv.), and Powis-land then comprehending all this part of the country. (Gough, ii. 583.) “Moel Penlli, or Benlli’s Hill, is remarkable for having on “it a strong British post, guarded as usual by dikes and fosses. This probably was possessed “by a chieftain of that name, for Nennius speaks of such a regulus of the country of Yal.” (Pennant’s North-Wales, i. 416.) Mr. Pennant was the speaker, we find, and Mr. Gough is the echo; yet neither of them has attempted to accommodate such a fortress to the narrative of Nennius.

where in the parish was that house? This it is impossible to point out with any greater share of certainty than what results from a mere analysis of names, and throws a quivering sort of morning-twilight over the inquiry; this, however, will be sufficient for our purpose, if we can prosecute our inquiry under the clouds that hang over it with any critical insight into the Cornish language. The ignorance, indeed, that prevails among the present inhabitants of Cornwall concerning the language of their ancestors, concerning the signification of the local names that meet them at every turn, is very wonderful in itself: but it appears peculiarly wonderful if ever vanity happens to irradiate the ignorance, and so exhibit it more conspicuous to the world, “the blackness of “darkness” then being strikingly displayed by the passing flash of a meteor. Thus a gentleman even literary, refined, and lively, observing lately a field of his that was vulgarly known by the appellation of the Bowling-green, to be denominated in his legal papers Parc Behan (or Little Field) in Cornish, was struck with the supposed magnificence of the title, ridiculously resolved to build a house upon it for the sake of this, and then more ridiculously gave his house the English appellation—of BEHAN PARK. A bowling-green of Cornwall was dilated and expanded by the force of folly into a park of England! Such are the monsters produced by ignorance, when it is impregnated by vanity! but as we are secure from this, so are we in no danger from that. Let us see, therefore, the names of the greater houses in the parish at present. They are these: Hendra, Cutcrew, or Treskelly, Pole-Martin, Molinek, or Coldrinneck, Bake, Cuddenbeak, or Catch-French. None of these seem to signify a royal habitation; but, in order to see effectually whether they do or not, we must examine the British of them in its real import, pursue the analogy of meaning through the British dialects, and so reach the radical idea of every appellation at last.

HENDRA, indeed, which is compounded of H'en old, and Dra a house in Cornish, carries antiquity in its name, but bespeaks no royalty. CUTCREW implies it only to have been a hut in a wood; Cuit (C.) being a wood, Crow (C.) being the same word with Crowyn, Crywyn, Crewyn (W.), a kennel or a hut, and with Crue (English), a rack in a farm-yard.

yard. But TRESKELLY is a name of grander import, Tre Kelli signifying Grove House, and the intermediate letter being only interpolated euphoniæ gratiâ occasionally. POLE-MARTIN is merely the standing water; Pol (C.) being the same with Pool in English, meaning merely water as in the Pool of London, that part of the Thames which is immediately below the old bridge, and therefore requiring the union of Merthyn (A.) with it for stagnating the water. By the same analogy of language, the equivalent Lock of the Britons, applied equally by us English in our Lake to a piece of stagnant water, is still used by the Highlanders and the Irish for an arm of the sea, and was even used with Lake by Leland's cotemporaries in the very vicinity of London, for an arm of an inland river. "The first arme that breketh owt by west of "the mayne streame," says Leland himself concerning the river Lee of Hertfordshire, "ys a mile lower then Wormeley, but in that paroch, "and is caullid Wormeley Lokke, and rennith by Cheston nunnery and "paroch, standing on the west side of this arme. And owt of this "streame breketh a litle beneth Cheston nunnery, an arme caullid the "Shere Lake, because that it devidith Estsax and Hertfordshire; and in "the lengt of one medow, caullid Frithey, this Lake or arme rennith "not but at great fluddes*." MOLINEK speaks only its own relation to a mill, Melyn (W.), Melin (C.), Melin, Meill, Mul, Mui-lean (I.), importing a mill, and being only the echoes of the Latin Mola or Molendinum; with the termination of the possessive adjective, the same in British as in Latin, and shewing itself equally in Britannicus and Brethonek (C.) for British. And COLDRIKNECK is descriptive solely of the land on which it once lay; as Col (C.) is a ridge or neck of a hill, Rhyn (W.) a mountain, a hill, a cape, or a promontory; Ran (Erse) the same, Rhyn (C.) a hill, Rhynen, Ranen (C.), a hillock, Rinn (I.) a peninsula or neck of land, or (which is evidently the primary idea) the point of a sword or spear, and Rinneach (I.) sharp-pointed. Col Rinneach, therefore, refers to that sharp-pointed ridge of a hill, on which Coldrinneck originally stood, and what is denominated the Higher Coldrinneck still stands.

* Itin. vi. 55.

BAKE assumed its appellation probably from the original smallness of its house: as Little has been frequently used for the surname of a person, as a gentleman's house in Wiltshire is denominated Littlecot at present, or as Netley Abbey, in Hampshire, is properly denominated Little at times, the very Letelege of Leland*; and as Bách (W.), Bach (C.), answers to Little in English. Just so, Tre-bigh is a name even for the capital of a large manor in Cornwall†. Ty Bychan also signifies in the laws of Howel Dha‡, what modern refinement is now exalting into a water-closet; and so stands a full evidence that we had, at least from the settlement of the Romans among us, a presumptive evidence that we had before their settlement, those necessary appendages to our houses, which have been found in the Roman buildings at Pompeii, and in Roman remains within our own island, which were therefore known to our monasteries probably from their first erection; but were certainly familiar to them during the eleventh or twelfth century, yet were unknown even in Madrid within these fifty years, and are even unknown to families above the vulgar in Cornwall at this day. Nor do we find them wanting among our Saxon sovereigns or Saxon nobles, though structures of such a quality cannot be expected to catch the common notice of history. Man is obliged to do what he is ashamed to mention, feels himself degraded by the necessary attentions to his own body, and so proves himself in descent, in destination, or in both, superior to his present situation even in the scale of nature alone. Yet a memorable incident in the death of a Saxon king has brought the building forward to the eye of history, and compelled our historians to mention it. That gallant hero Edmund Iron-side, the true representative of the Athelstans, the Alfreds, or the Cerdics of his family, the last supporter of the Saxon monarchy, and in whose fall it fell; even he, in 1016, “sleeping for a night at Oxford, when he stepped aside into a secret retired room for the functions of nature, a son of Eadric's, instigated by his father, “concealed himself in the secret pit, struck the king [as he was

* Itin. iii. 110: The abbey is equally termed Lettelue, in the inscription upon its own seal. (Arch. xiii. 195.)

† Hals, 116.

‡ Howel Dha, i. 47, p. 71.

“sitting] in his private parts, with a poniard doubly sharpened, “thus gave him deadly wound, and flying, left the weapon in his “bowels §.” So familiar in our houses of royalty at lesat was this kind of room, as early as the murder of Edmund in 1016! Yet we find it in another fact of murder, above a hundred years before, and at the house of a mere noble; since “Earl Stephen, the brother of Walo,” says Worcester, “as sitting in secession he eased nature, is struck with “an arrow through the window, and dies from the wound the same “night ¶.” And we also find it mentioned repeatedly as an appendage to our monasteries, in the ages since ¶. Teagh Beag, or Beg, means the same sort of building, in Irish. But, what is very surprising, the popular denomination for it is the Bog, or the Bog-house, among the academics of Oxford; even of that Oxford, at which we find one in 1016, and among those academics, who as little think they are talking British, when they so call it, as the alderman of London thought he was talking prose when he spoke in conversation. But just in the very mode of forming Bach into a substantive, so leaving it to stand as the designator of an object by itself, we find Beuch (I.), Bee (English), the ancient as well as the modern appellative of what the natives of North-America call the Englishman’s fly, as introduced among them by

§ Matt. Westm. 401: “Rege apud Oxoniam pernoctante, dum ad domum secretiorem “ad exquisita naturæ diverteret, filius—Eadrici, patris instinctu, in foveâ delitescens secre- “tariâ,—eundem regem cultello bis acuto inter eclanda percussit, et eo lethaliter vulnerato, “inter viscera fugiens ferrum reliquit.” Mahmsbury, f. 40: “Ad naturæ requisita “sedenti.”

¶ Flor. Wigorn. 337: “Stephanus comes, frater Walonis, cum in secessu residens “alvum purgaret, sagittâ per fenestram percussus; unde eâdem nocte extinguitur.”

¶ At Winchester monastery, one of the oldest probably in the kingdom, were “domus “necessariæ, ac officinæ; monarchorum.” (Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 185.) St. Alban’s monastery, about the year 1200, is said to have rebuilt “vetus dormitorium “ruinosum et præ vetustate tabefactum, cum dormitorii appendiciis,” like our night-stools in our bed-rooms, “videlicet, domicilio necessariorum.” (M. Paris, 1047.) Peterborough monastery was burnt down in the twelfth century, “præter capitulum, et dormitorium, et “necessarium.” (Leland’s Coll. i. 15.) And Chillenden, prior of Christ-church, in Can- terbury, from 1490 to 1511, “domos quampures,” as answering to the great number of monks, “necessarias, longo tempore dirutas, de novo fecit ac emendavit.” (Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 143.)

the

the English, and what our ancestors the Britons so denominated merely from its littleness.

CUDDEN BEAK reflects a very different light to the mind's eye, is purely local, is confined to the site, and implies a wooded point of land. Cout (C.) is timber or wood, Coed (W.), wood, timber, or trees, Coeden (W.), a tree, Cudon (C.), Cudon, Cuddon (W.), a wood-dove, properly and precisely (as appears from analogy) any thing belonging to a wood; Cudyn (W.), a lock of hair, or wool; Cudin (C.), the hair of the head, a lock of hair, or a bush, and properly any thing bushy or wood-like. Thus we have one of earl Moreton's manors within Cornwall, called expressly in Doomsday Book Cuda-noid *. We have even a headland a little to the east of St. Michael's Mount, more appositely to our present purpose denominated Cudden (or wooded) Point, at this moment. Beak indeed, in the name at St. German's, is only the same in signification as point. Yet it is equally British with its accompanying Cudden, being still retained without disguise in the Armorican Bek, but changed into Pyg in Cornish and Pig in Welsh, still preserved in all its primitive form by Beak in English, and meaning in all these languages the bill of a bird. But such a bill is so denoted, from the prior import of the word; Pig (W.) being a prick or point, Piecell (C.), a dart, an arrow, a javelin; Piga (C.), to prick; Pigol (C.), a mattock, a pick-axe; Pikel (in Lancashire) a pitch-fork; and Pig (C.), a pig in English, so denominated from the sharpness of its snout. Beak therefore signifies any sharp or pointed object, and so comes here to import a point of land sharp in its configuration. But let me elucidate this explanation by a reference to authority. "Beg, Bec, or Bek," says Pelletier in his Dictionary of the Language of Bretagne, is "a point, a pointed extremity; I find it used for the face, or at least for the mouth," surely for the mouth alone, by transition from a bird's bill, "in this passage of the Life of St. Gwenolé, Ho bec d'am bec lequet, ha m' ystryset, Put

* Hals, 140, says, that this is the name in Doomsday Book for Cudden Beak itself; when it is only one among many names of lands under "Terra comitis Meritoniensis," and when all these are discriminated expressly from the lands of the bishop at St. Germans.

“ your face [mouth] to my face [mouth], and embrace me [press me, or give me a pressing kiss]: Bec is used also for the beak of birds, and “ even the muzzle of four-footed beasts,” by the same transition from the bill of a bird.—“ Bec is one of the ancient words Gallic or Celtic, “ recognized for such by the ancients and by the moderns. Though “ we see it written before ‘ Ho Bec,’ our Bretoons pronounce it com- “ monly ‘ Ho Pec,’ your bill, your mouth ;” just as we have seen Bec in Armorican changed into Pig in Welsh, or Pyg in Cornish, and just as we still use it familiarly among ourselves, in Peak a sharp prominence, or a sharp angle.—“ It is from the figure signified by this word, that “ we have those appellations of Bec d’Allier, of Bec d’Ambes, to mark “ the point of land which forms the junction of two rivers,” as an angular prominence between them. “ We also give the name,” for the same reason, “ to promontories and capes ; and it is common on the western “ side of Normandy, as Bec de Champeaux, Bec d’Agon, *Bec du Banc.”

This

* Pelletier, 47: “ Beg, Bec, ou Bek, pointe, extrémité pointue. Je le trouve pour la “ face, ou du moins pour la bouche, en cet endroit de la Vie de Saint Gwenolé, Ho lec “ d’am bec lequet, ha m’ystryzet, Mettez votre face sur ma face, et m’embrassez. Bec se “ dit aussi du bec des oiseaux, et même du museau des bêtes à quatre pieds.—Bec est un “ de ces anciens mots Gaulois ou Celtique, reconnus pour tels par les anciens et par les “ modernes. Quoique l’on voye ci-dessus, ‘ Ho Bec,’ nos Bretons prononcent commune- “ ment, ‘ Ho Pec,’ votre bec, votre bouche.—C’est de la figure signifié par ce mot, que sont “ venus ceux de Bec d’Allier, de Bec d’Ambes, pour marquer la pointe de terre que ferme “ la jonction des deux rivières. On donne aussi ce nom, aux promontoires et caps ; et il “ est commun dans la côte occidentale de Normandie, Bec de Champeaux, Bec d’Agon, “ Bec du Banc.” That I correct the very lexicographer of the Bretoon language, in his very explanation of Bretoon terms ; may seem to carry an air of high presumption, in the act. But the correction appears too just from the context to provoke the charge. “ Put “ your mouth to my mouth, and press me [with a kiss],” is obviously the meaning from that law of sound sense, which is paramount to all criticism on language. M. Pelletier himself accordingly renders the words very nearly up to my interpretation, in 844, 845. “ Stris,” he there says with more of mind as he had advanced farther in his lexicon, “ étroit, serré, pressé—. Dans un endroit de la Vie de S. Gwenolé, il est employé au “ sens honnête, Ho lec d’am bec lequet, ha m’stryzet, Mettez votre bouche à ma bouche, et “ m’embrassez, me pressez. C’est Gralon, que l’on fait parler ainsi à son parent Fragan, “ pere du saint. Je lis dans autre endroit de cette même Vie, Striz, comme adverb, pour “ dire de pres, ou avec application, et attentivement.—Davies n’a point de mot, qui répond “ à celui-ci.” The Welsh in truth has no word correspondent. The Irish also has none.

But

This is fully sufficient of itself to ascertain the meaning of our Cornish appellation. But as we had lately an etymologist, Mr. Morgan, a dissenting teacher at Leskard, from Wales in the vicinity, who employed the knowledge of his native language frequently in decyphering the local names around him; who was actually deemed by those that could not judge, to be very happy in his explanations; yet was in fact most fantastically wrong, resolving Cudden Beak (for instance) into—Cudin (W.), a lock of hair or wool, and Bach (W.), little; yet interpreting it a little promontory, as if a promontory could possibly be expressed in any language by a lock of wool or hair; for that reason I have taken so large a compass of examination before, and for that reason I shall enlarge a little more now, willing to chase away such impertinence for ever from the minds of my cotemporaries in Cornwall. Pelletier has thrown a considerable light upon the subject. I have augmented this light. But more may be still thrown. I therefore remark additionally, that in the interiors of that Normandy, in which we find a local name completely Cornish, Tre-port, for the port-town of Eu; we equally find Bec distinguished by its ancient abbey, but situated at the confluence of two rivulets *. We also find there, what approximates both in sound and sense very closely to our Cudden Beak, Caudebec, a town near Rouen; at the union of a couple of currents, like that; like that too, at the point of a woody hill; and actually resolved by Bullet, the great linguist of the Celtic, just as I have resolved Cudden Beak, into Côt a wood, and Bec a tongue of land at the union of two rivers †. We have even in

But the Cornish has, not in Pryce however, but in Borlase; Striz being interpreted by the latter as narrow, streight [strait], and Striza to bind fast. The predominating idea of the word then, is what I have fixed upon it above, pressing; applies equally to a kiss, as to an embrace; and, in conjunction with the word mouth, can mean a kiss alone. And I thus notice the wrong, that Pryce has done to the Cornish language and to himself, by omitting this with numerous other words specified by Borlase, and this so authenticated by the appearance of the same word in Armorick, strait in English, strictus in Latin. See also v. 3, a note

* Bullet's Memoires sur la Langue Celtique, i. 129: "Bec, bourg situé sur une langue de terre, à l'embouchure du Bec dans la Rille.—La riviere de Bec a pris son nom de ce bourg."

† Ibid. 130: "Caudebec, sur le bord de la Seine, qui y reçoit une petite riviere,—au pied d'une montagne couverte de bois. Cod, forêt; Bec, embouchure."

Pelletier's own province of Bretagné, Bec du Raz, a headland on the shore near Brest. But to bring the argument home to our own region, upon our coast of Cornwall, in the line of the north sea, and near to St. Genys, we have a promontory denominated expressly Cam-beak, or the Crooked Point, to this day. That Cudden Beak had a large wood adjoining to it even at the Conquest, I shall soon shew; and that it is a hill projecting between two currents of water, the surveying eye assures us at once, Polvathic being a stream on the west, and Tiddiford on the east*.

Not one of these names, however, confesses any relation in itself to royalty. Yet perhaps the only remaining one will, as it seems peculiarly strange, and very different in sound or form from all the rest; CAREN FRENCH. This indeed is so different, and so strange, that it naturally excites our surprise at the hearing, and powerfully provokes our amazement on examination. It is plainly a name that has been thrown into the crucible of vulgar pronunciation, and come out again disfigured completely in its aspect. What its original aspect therefore was, it is the business of critical chemistry to ascertain. The mere sound of the letters at first suggests to an English ear, that the name is derived from some interception of a party of French, landed upon the coast adjoining, and penetrating thus far, about three or four miles, up into the country. This is accordingly the very interpretation, which Carew, in his usual spirit of both thinking and talking with the vulgar, has adopted; but adopted with so much want of explicitness, as shews he was half ashamed of it. "Catch-French," he says, is "a house, so named (by likely-hood) for some former memorable, though now forgotten accident †." Such an interpretation, indeed, is worthy of the vulgar alone, who are obliged to ring names like vessels, and to judge of their goodness by their sound in the English language. Scholars, therefore, mount upon the wings of learning, and soar a higher flight; explaining the name into Chasse Franche, or a Free Chase. Etymologists always refer a local appellation to that language, with which they are most conversant themselves; schoolboys, or young academics, to the Latin or the Greek, and lawyers to Norman-French. But in etymologizing there is a better light to direct us, than any which learning can furnish, good sense; a kind of solar beam, steady and sure, in comparison with which learning is merely an unctuous vapour, kindled by accident, dancing at random, and leading into quagmires. Men of judgment know, that local names should be explained only in the vernacular language of the country; and that, though affectation may occasionally generate a foreign name, as nature makes a monster now and then, yet the regular course is very different. The local names in Cornwall are almost all Cornish. They are so in the parish of St. German's particularly, as we have seen already; though lying along the line of its eastern frontier, a part first subdued by the arms and most marked by the language of encroaching England. This name of Catch-French, therefore, we may be sure, is equally Cornish with the rest. We have even a name, and the name of a royal house, not very dissimilar to the former half of this name at an early period of our and the French history; when, in 887, the Danes are reported to have left Paris, to have rowed under the bridge against the current of the Seine, till they came to the mouth of the Marne, to have then turned into the Marne, and, "with some toil, to "have reached a place which is called Caziei, it is a royal ville *." Nor is its Cornish genealogy very difficult to be unravelled. Thus Cae (A.) is a hedge, Ke (C.) is a hedge, Cae (W.) is a hedge or an enclosure, Kea (C.) is an enclosure, and Kac (C.) is a field †. This is consequently the same with the Saxon þæg, or our hedge; is accordingly lengthened out in ancient monuments of the Gauls, into Cugia a close, an enclosure; and ends at last in Caga, a cage, both in French and

* Carew, 109, with a good luck that seems more the result of accident than of judgment, and merely from attention to the English termination of the name, has fallen upon this very etymon. "At the town's end," he says, "Cuddenbeak,—from a well-advanced promontory, which entituled it Beak, taketh a pleasant prospect of the river."

† Carew, 109.

* Asser, 54: "Sub illo ponte sursum contra Signe longè remigando,—donec ad ostium fluminis quod Materre nominatur pervenisset, tunc Sigonam descientes in ostium Materræ divertunt, contra quod diu ac longè navigantes, demum non sine labore usque ad locum, qui dicitur Caziei, id est villa regia, pervenerunt."

† Borlase,

in English, in Caque (French), Cac (Armorican), Cag (English) a little barrel, in Cag, Cager, a village, or in Cageois, old French for a villager*. But we have a village within our own Cornwall, upon the shore of the south sea, and in the parish of Ruan Minor near the Lizard, denominated with a closer approach to similarity Cadge-with; as we have equally a house in Madern parish entitled Rose-cadg-wel, and in Illugan parish Nance-keage Downs, Great Nance-keage, Little Nance-keage, near Nance. We have thus traced out a Cornish word that adapts itself with great exactness to the former half of the appellation, and shall more easily discover another, which will with equal exactness suit the latter. Prinsa (I.), Prins (A.), and Fryns (C.), is the same word with the English and the French Prince; we even have the word compounded into local appellations in the “Croft Prince” and the “Goon Prince” of St. Agnes parish; two appellations that, in the Cornish tone of pronouncing them, would be “Croft Fryns” and “Goon Fryns.” Here, then, without any violence offered to the language, merely “lene tormentum ingenio admovens plerumque duro,” and exerting only the power requisite to elicit the truth by examination, I have found a house in the parish of St. German’s that tells us its royal origin, and was honoured probably with the residence of Germanus during his visit in Cornwall.

From several of these names we see that the parish was once covered with woods, and that some of the houses were prior to the destruction of the trees; records also come in to confirm the existence of those woods, even so late as the Conquest, and to shew us the large dimensions of them even then. Domesday Book notices one wood on that part of the manor of St. German’s, of which Cudden Beak (as I shall shew hereafter) had the capital house upon it; to be two miles long and *one broad: it also speaks of another wood in the parish, as four miles long and two broad†. Much of the woods, however, had undoubtedly been then destroyed; and we find accordingly two ranges of pastures then, the first two miles long and one broad, but the second four long with two broad‡. This destruction first began probably at CATCH-FRENCH, and the house there I suppose to have been on a lawn in the bosom of the forest, a mere lodge for hunting in the woods around. But the forest afterwards receded on every side, from the permitted excision of the trees, and the licensed construction of the houses, till CUT-CREW, the mere hut of some woodman, rose into a gentleman's habitation; till the house of the king's warden of the woods perhaps assumed the appellation of HENDRA or Old House, in reference to the new houses about it; and till TRESKELLY became characterized as the House in the Grove, when others were now in open situations. A mill had been erected for the use of the palace, probably about a mile from it, and the house of the king's miller adopted a name descriptive of his business, MOLINEK. A small house was also built at BAKE, and had the degrading appellation of Little assigned it by those who always denominate from what they see; who have therefore denominated a privy in Wales and in England, with a singular coincidence of language for eight hundred years together, Ty Bychan, the Bog, or the Little House. But CUDDEN BEAK continued long to be screened from the winds on its exposed situation by large remains of the proscribed forest, and so acquired the natural title of the Wooded Point. Yet, as the English language broke in upon the Cornish, the latter retreating towards the west before the victorious progress of the former, Cornish names of places began to be assimilated in sound to English; Restronget, or Stronget Passage, near Penryn, was vitiated in pronuncia-

* Bullet, ii. 247, 248. By “ancient monuments” Bullet means lives of saints, histories, and chronicles. (See his preface to vol. ii. at the end.) Pelletier, in p. 106: “Cacons—, “nom est, si je ne me trompe, venu du François Caque, petit tonneau, prononcé par nos “Bretons Cac.” The English language thus appears to have preserved a British word, when all the dialects of the British have lost it.

* Vol. i. fol. 120: "Silva ii leucas longa et unam leucam lata." For the length of the leuca, see an explicit passage in Ingulphus, fol. 517, Savile, first produced by Spelman.

† Ibid. ibid. "Silva iiii leucas longa et ii leucas lata."

‡ Ibid. ibid. "Ibi pastura iiii leucas longa et ii leucas lata;—ibi pastura ii leucas lata" "[longa] et unam leucam lata."

tion into its popular name of Strangwæge at present †; and Cadge Fryns was corrupted into CATCH-FRENCH*.

The king of Cornwall was probably induced by Germanus to begin this excision of the trees, and to turn the old wood into a new parish by erecting a church, by settling a rector at it, and by giving him the tithes of the new enclosures, with a portion of the enclosures for a glebe. Germanus certainly resided some time in the present parish, as “the inhabitants,” only eighty years ago, “retained several stories” concerning him. The church was plainly erected within a short time after his visit, because of the compliment that was paid to his name in affixing it to the church; a compliment that was paid perhaps in all the places which he visited, was certainly paid in several, but in all must have been paid while the memory of his visit was yet warm upon the royal mind, while the view of his religiousness was yet lively in the royal breast, and both yet breathed in aromatic odours to the royal remembrance. Germanus died the year after this journey into Cornwall §, and was immediately sainted. This appears from the express appellation of Saint, which was given him by the biographer of Lupus; when he says, that Lupus went into Britain “with Saint Germanus, a man replete with “all perfection and spiritual grace ‡.” But it appears still more early from facts in our own island. “Near the walls of the ruined Verulam,” cries Camden, “the chapel of Germanus even yet retains his name, “though it is now applied to profane uses, on the spot from which, as “from a pulpit, he spoke the divine word, which some fragments of an † Leland’s Itin. iii. 27: “Betwixt the point of land of Trefuses and the point of “Restronget wood, is Milor creek—. Good wood in Restrionget. The next creek beyond “the point in Strongel wood is caullid Restrionget.—Betwixt Restriongeth creke and,” &c.

* It is very extraordinary that the name of the family which formerly possessed this estate was correspondent with this etymon in the prior half of it, Keck-witch. Yet as the “ancient “dwelling” of this family “was in Essex, where this gentleman [Mr. George Keckwitch] “enjoyeth fayre possessions” (Carew, 109); the correspondency is merely casual, a kind of lusus naturæ upon etymologists.

§ Usher, 204, 205.

‡ Usher, 176: “Cum S. Germano, totius perfectionis et gratiæ spiritalis pleno.”

“ancient

“ancient history concerning St. Alban’s church do witness §.” This has been pulled down since the days of Camden, but the site is still marked to the eye; it was not, however, where Dr. Stukeley has placed it, within the walls of Verulam, and near the eastern end of the town, but stood upon the vacant ground between the river and the walls, towards that bridge by which Fishpool Street in St. Alban’s is stretching out to people the desolated site of Verulam again. And such was the reverence paid to Germanus’s memory, that though Verulam was ruined soon afterwards, the whole compass of it destroyed from end to end, and the site of this grand municipium of the Romans converted into a deer-park for the abbey adjoining, with the Roman walls standing for pales to it, yet the ground retains to this moment the appellation of St. German’s Farm: the continuance of the chapel perpetuated the name through its history as a park to its condition as a farm. Thus has the memory of St. German survived upon this scene of his distinguished activity through all the revolutions of Verulam, from its height of splendour at the time, to its abyss of humiliation at present; has even extended from a lonely chapel without the walls, in spite of all revolutions, and diffused his name at present over all the site of the city*.

In

§ Camden, 293: “Juxta prostratæ urbis mœnia, Germani sacellum etiamnum nomine, etsi profano usu, superest; quo loci ille, pro suggestu verbum divinum effatus erat; ut antiquæ fani Albani membranulæ testantur.” Thus, when archbishop Baldwin went through Wales in 1188, to preach up a crusade, at Aberteivy “in loco—prædicationis, “juxta caput pontis, tanquam tanti conventûs memoriale, locum capellæ in viridi planicie “statim plebs devota signavit; ubi vestigia loquendo ad populum archiepiscopus fixerat, “altare designantes.” (Giraldus Cambrensis, Itin. Cambr. 860.)

* Camden, in his reference to “antiquæ fani Albani membranulæ,” appears to have met with a record more accurate and more just than what M. Paris had found. Camden’s author makes the building a chapel, erected on the very spot from which Germanus preached to the assembled crowds; while M. Paris’s calls it merely “habitaculum—illud, in quo “idem Sanctus Germanus, postquam veneranter corpus sancti martyris de terrâ levaveret, “moram fecit aliquando.” (P. 993.) Camden’s is apparently the true account, while Paris’s is as contradictory as it is false. Though it is denominated an habitation, and though Germanus is said to have resided some time in it, yet it is instantly declared by Paris to have been “in convalle pomœrii,” in the valley without the walls of Verulam; “ubi paludes et “arundines capacia loca reddunt inhabitabilia,” a place capable of receiving assembled crowds in it, but not habitable in itself, because of the reedy marsh there. There the build-

In that very region of Jal, too, which we have seen Germanus visiting before, and in that very parish probably at which he visited king Benli, ing “ignobiliter jacuit derelictum, et ædificia diruta vix vestigia memoriæ prædicti sancti “reliquerunt;” nearly five centuries having now passed since the visit of Germanus to Verulam. But then “fabricata fuit basilica,” a grander kind of chapel, the very chapel which Camden saw, “juxta mœnia,” just without the walls; and “quidam ibidem” “monachus claustralis, eximie sanctitatis vir, vitam longo tempore duxit heremiticam, “hortos coluit, herbis et leguminibus et aquâ in abstinentiâ mirabile, et orationibus “indefatigabilibus, deduxit.” (Ibid.) The next abbot, “non procul a loco illo, oratorium in honore Sanctæ Mariæ Magdalænæ construxit,” which still remains, but is equally without the walls, and is close by the old entrance into Verulam from London. (Stukeley’s Itin. Cur. in plate 95, and Mr. Newcome’s History of St. Alban’s, p. 28.) Yet Dr. Stukeley places the chapel within the walls, and Mr. Newcome coincides with him; implicitly following the Doctor, even when he himself has just given an account from M. Paris that directly contradicts the Doctor. “Germanus,” he cries, in p. 32, from the historical errors of M. Paris, “—had made some abode at this place, and had “dwelt in a small habitation;” which, however, Mr. Newcome is prudent enough not to place with M. Paris in an uninhabitable site. But, as he adds immediately from M. Paris concerning what M. Paris could not but know to be true, this building was “behind the wall “of Verulam, and contiguous to the pool :” yet, as he instantly subjoins, “some remains “of this chapel are to be seen in Dr. Stukeley’s View of Verulam,” which places it within the walls. So contradictory can a writer be in a small compass! As, however, he advances farther in his history, he sees he is wrong, and corrects Dr. Stukeley, but forgets to correct himself. “In the spot where Dr. Stukeley has placed St. German’s chapel,” he remarks in p. 508, from a plan of Verulam made in 1637, “here stood a very respectable mansion “of brick, with a court in front, and stables, &c. a place fit for gentled inhabitants; and “the chapel was situated near the—bank” of the river or morass, “in the corner of a little “meadow.” This meadow is evidently what is mentioned in the fourteenth century, though Mr. Newcome seems all unconscious of the relationship; when Richard the twenty-eighth abbot is said by Mr. Newcome himself to have “augmented the pool of the abbey-mill “after repairing the same; and the meadow adjoining, called Saint German’s Meadow,” to have “raised.” (P. 228.) Yet where does all Verulam appear to bear the name of St. German? It appears from Mr. Newcome, though with his previous contradictoriness, “the old site of Verulam,” he tells us in p. 508, “is still called Saint German’s Farm.” The language is fully comprehensive, we see, and covers the whole site; yet the tide instantly recedes, as Mr. Newcome instantly adds, “all the broad part of the same, extending from the—bank to the Hampstead road, and containing more than 70 acres,” when the whole is not, indeed, 450, as Chauncy relates, p. 416: yet, as Mr. Newcome himself alleges, p. 28, “not less than 100” is all that “is called by that name.” But this is merely that casual contradictoriness of confusion in which ideas impinge upon ideas,

“As gods meet gods, and jostle in the dark;”

because

Benli, the long tale in Nennius of Germanus's coming to the gates of the citadel, of Benli's refusing to let him be admitted, and of all the wonders resulting from both, being evidently false in itself, a mere mass of Gothic architecture, resting upon a slight pillar of truth in the

because the author avers immediately below, that "after the fall and ruin of Verulam, this site received the name of Germanus—these fields still bear this name;" and "in the year 1637—the property of Saint German's Farm—was in sir Thomas Cotton," &c. An abbot also, about 1330, "caused the hedges, ways, and closes, about Saint German's," the old town so called, and now a farm, "to be repaired, and sowed a croft there of four acres with acorns, intending to make a wood; he had sown this land [with corn] four years together, and never had a return of the seed again," from the many foundations in the ground, I suppose, and from the hardness of the streets between them; "but this year, after sowing the acorns, he caused seven bushels of seed to be thrown on the ground, and," from such repeated rippings of the soil, I presume, "in the following autumn the crop was about ten quarters of very good wheat." (P. 228.) This site, however, is divided into six or seven "fields, called Dorvaille, upper, lower, and middle, which alludes to the name of these lands in the time of Henry III. when they were called Derefold" (p. 508); and when a neighbouring baron, "cū—injuriis injurias multotiens accumulasset, tandem quendam monachum—nequiter percussisset armatus, equum pretiosum cooperitum insidens, et armatorum multorum agmine stipatus, discurrens et fugans cum suis canibus et venatoribus, juxta curiam nostram, scilicet apud Derefold; quod quidem abbas et conventus," from the high ground of the monastery, commanding all the site of Verulam, "intueri potuerat, et audire." (M. Paris, 1072.) "At the time of the Conquest,—at the survey directed by William," notes Mr. Newcome, 507, "here was a vivarium (see Domesday), or place for keeping wild beasts, and choice animals," with them: "here was the only place of this kind in the whole kingdom." Yet, to shew how inaccurate authors can be in their very reference to records, this vivarium in Domesday Book appears to be merely a fish-pool, and is actually opposed to a park. "Unus parcus ibi est," says the Book expressly, "bestiarum sylvaticarum," words meaning merely what deop means in Saxon, wild beasts in its general signification, but only deer in its particular, and so giving the park the appellation of Dere-fold, or Dor-vaille; "et unum vivarium piscium" (fol. 135); even that very fish-pool which the seventh abbot bought, with Kingsbury certainly, and with Verulam assuredly, from king Edgar, "piscinam magnam et profundam, quæ fispol dicebatur, erat autem regum piscaria," which the abbot immediately, "in quantum potuit,—redegit in aridam," of which "adhuc apparent termini et altæ crepidines juxta viam et vicum qui Fispolstrate nuncupatur," yet "remansit"—abbati quædam non magna piscina" (M. Paris, 993), large enough, however, to be noticed by Domesday Book. I have entered into this long note in justification of my text, and in elucidation of some points of local history concerning St. German, peculiarly clouded over with confusedness.

centre;

centre; we equally find great reverence paid to his memory, and a parish-church distinguished by his name. In "Yale lordship," says Leland, "—there is—a 4 or 5 paroches; whercof the most famous is LLAN-ARMON, W. e. PARUM GERMANI.—Greate pilgrimage and offering was a late to St. Armon *." The object of devotion to the offering pilgrims, was the image of Germanus in the wall of the church. "Llan-
" armon [is] a village," says Mr. Pennant, "whose church is dedi" cated to St. Germanus; he was a most popular patron, and has num" bers of other churches in Wales under his protection: an image of an
" ecclesiastic, still to be seen in the church wall †."

There must equally have been an image of Germanus in our Cornish church; and a statue still kept in the priory, but reported to be the representation of the last prior, is assuredly that very image. It is about three feet in height, and appears plainly to have been fixed in a niche; the bottom of it shews a large spike to have been thrust up the body of it, in order to preserve it from falling; a hole capable of admitting a finger into it still appearing there. It was not placed, however, like the Welsh image, in a niche in the wall, but in one of tabernacle-work, as the back of it is not left rude or unfinished, is indeed as finished as the front, and was therefore calculated for a niche open equally on both: it also bears in its hand a smaller statue, about five or six inches only in length, standing upon a book, and designed (I doubt not) to represent our Saviour resting upon the Old Testament ‡. It is of wood, painted with the face vermillioned, and the robes carved, from the good state of preservation in which it still appears, being of no great antiquity. It is accordingly dressed just as, I suppose, its counterpart in North-Wales to be, being equally with that "the image of an eccle-

* Leland's Itin. iii. 35.

† Tour in North-Wales, i. 407. So, "in provinciâ de Warthrenion," near Rauner (see iv. 1, before), we find "ecclesia—Sancti Germani" (Giraldus's Itin. Cam. 821), now "Sannit Harman," in the maps, I suppose, and "St. Harmon, alias Llan Armon, prebend and vicarage," in the deanery of Melleneth.

‡ So we have in a painting at one of the churches of Seville, "a Saint Anthony of Padua, holding the infant Jesus on a book." (Swinburne, ii. 39.)

“siastic;” yet not of a secular ecclesiastic, but of a merely monastic one. A loose kind of frock is bound about the middle with a cord-like girdle, that hangs in a tasselled string to the foot; a hood stands stiffly reclining upon the shoulders, and a tippet is lying flat under it, a hood designed for the head, and a tippet formed for the neck; not such as are worn in the universities at present, a hood with the head part hanging below the rump, or a tippet dangling in a triangular fold like a shoulder-knot behind, but as worn recently or at present by our women, the tippet, particularly, being pointed behind like a woman’s handkerchief, and reaching down with its point to the middle of the back. But the statue bears equally that symbol of a clergyman, either monastic or secular, which was originally a circle of hair upon the crown of the head, which however became afterwards (as here) a circle of baldness, produced from time to time by shaving, and was denominated a tonsure under either form*. It thus stood within a niche, but under a canopy, attracting the reverential attention, and receiving the idolatrous adoration of the whole parish; yet has now suffered more than two centuries of slight and contumely in return, what was once worshipped as a divinity being afterwards affronted as an idol, the slight even continuing when the contumely had ended, the slight actually surviving all knowledge of the reason for it, and the unknown god of the temple being thrust into a corner at the head of the stairs to the offices below. It stood originally, no doubt, in the front of that gallery which I have previously noticed to have been an organ-loft, to have been torn down at the Reformation, and to have had its ascent to it blocked up by the position of a pew against the door. The images of our churches, indeed, were generally placed, not (as is commonly supposed) in the chancel, but in the front of that loft or gallery which rose high, and ranged projecting between the chancel and the nave, so united with the partitioning rails to shade the chancel much from view. But these galleries or lofts, with their statues, were removed by Henry, restored by Mary, and again removed by Elizabeth †. I thus account at once for the preservation in safety, and for the recentness in appearance, of St. German's image here. This was removed to the priory for its preservation, and there kept in safety from the hands of those reformers upon reformers, those imbibers of the vinegar of reformation in a double distillation of sharpness; who rose about a century afterwards, who reared themselves upon the shoulders of the first reformers, who, denominating themselves saints, would not allow any to be denominated saints beside, stripped the very Apostles of the prefix of saintship to their names, and would certainly have demolished this image of St. German, if it had still continued in its niche.

* St. Jerome: “Nec calvitium novaculâ esse faciendum, nec ita ad pressum tendendum caput ut rasorum, similes esse videamur.” Council of Toledo: “Omnes clerici, de tonso superius capite toto, inferius solam circuli coronam relinquant.” (Bingham, ii. 403-405.)

Had this image not been a recent one, modelled when all the collegiate clergy had been for three or four ages obliged to assume the monastic manner*; and when therefore every dignified divine was naturally considered by the million as a monastic one; St. German would have appeared in a different dress, in the genuine robes of a clergyman of the time. How then would he have appeared? I will endeavour to ascertain this, so open a curious point of history, and correct not merely the error of this image, but another error, seemingly sanctioned by still greater authority. "As to the kind or fashion of their [the clergy's] apparel," says Bingham, "it does not appear for several ages, that there was any other distinction observed therein between them and the laity, save that they were more confined to wear that which was modest and grave, and becoming their profession, without being tied to any certain garb or form of clothing.—This was St. Jerome's direction to Nepotian, that he should neither wear black nor white clothing; for gaiety," attached to white, "and † Mr. Denne's Histories of Lambeth Palace and Parish, p. 257-259. Mr. Denne attributes the first removal to Edward, overlooking this passage in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 457: "Anno xxx Henrici viij. regis, statuæ divorum e templis sublatæ sunt; et serinia argentea et aurea, unâ cum gemmis et aliis ornamentis annexis, ad fiscum regium delata sunt."

* See vii. 3, hereafter.

“ slovenliness,” attached to black! “ were equally to be avoided.” But the artificial idea of “ slovenliness” attached to black, soon gave way to the natural one of gravity. “ At Constantinople,” the metropolis of the empire, and therefore the exemplar to it, “ in the time of “ Chrysostom and Arsacius, the clergy commonly went in black.” Yet not in colour merely did their garments differ from those of the laity, though Bingham avers they did. Of “ the tunica,” adds he, “ there “ were two sorts, the dalmatica and the collobium; which differed “ only in this respect, that the collobium was the short coat without “ long sleeves, but the dalmatica was the—long coat with sleeves, both “ which were used by the Romans.” The former seems to correspond exactly with our short cassocks at present, and the latter with our long. And the suggestion seems to be confirmed by the Life of Cyprian, which says (as Bingham confesses) he wore a dalmatica. But, as the collobium was called hemiphorium by some, so the dalmatica was styled caracalla by others. “ The caracalla, which some now call “ the cassock,” cries Bingham, “ —was—first brought into use among “ the Roman people” by him who had his name from it, Antoninus Caracalla. “ But whether it was also a clerical habit in those days, may “ be questioned, since no ancient author speaks of it as such; but, if it “ was, it was not any peculiar habit of the clergy, since Spartian, who “ lived in the time of Constantine, says they were then used by the “ common people of Rome, who called them Caracallæ Antonianæ, “ from their author*.” This is all untrue in form or in substance, and I mean to prove it is. The dress of an ecclesiastic has been from the first ages, what is still the most distinguishing part it, a cassock. It appears to have been so from a very remarkable though utterly unnoticed incident, in the very first movements of Christianity and a clergy in our isle. When Antoninus Bassianus, the son of the emperor Severus, adopted himself, and recommended to his subjects, the use of the Gallic caracalla; the dress became very common at Rome, but continued most common among the lower ranks there †. It thus remained to the days

* Bingham, ii. 411-413, edit. 2d, octavo, 1710.

† Spartian, ix. Hist. Aug. Scrip. 417: “ In usu maximè Romanæ plebis frequentatæ.”
of

Published Nov. 21st 1845 by J. Stoddard & Co. Boston

of Dioclesian ¶. It was then, like our cassock, flowing down to the feet §. But before the days of Dioclesian it had been adopted, with some distinguishing difference assuredly, as the appropriated dress of the clergy. This difference I conjecture to have been what we see in our statue of Germanus, the addition of a hood for the head, to the carucalla of Antoninus; as the ancient glossers, seemingly from a mere association of ideas, produced by a combination of objects familiar to the eye, interpret carucalla by cucullus, a garment with a cowl to it ||. Accordingly we find the carucalla, in less than sixty years after Dioclesian, actually noticed by St. Jerome, as furnished with a hood, and as used by monks or ascetics *. And in a canon of the Saxon church, about the year 750 only, we find this express direction; that “the priest, when he sings mass, is not to have on a hood-cap; and, if he reads the Gospel, he should lay it,” as it is laid in the statue, “on his shoulders†.” That the caracalla was adopted by the clergy, and has been transmitted in the clerical cassock to our own days, was originally the conjecture of Salmasius; vitiating the name successively into caraca and casaca ‡, therefore wild in its appearance, yet (what is wonderful) true in its substance. But by so vitiating the name, in order to derive the thing, he was wild without necessity; cassock being related to caracalla only, as now signifying what the other formerly signified, yet borrowing its

¶ Spartian, ix. Hist. Aug. Scrip. 416: “Hodieq. Antoninianæ dicuntur.”

§ Ibid. 416: “Vestimento—demisso usque ad talos.”

|| Ibid. 417: “Καρχαλλῶν glossæ exponunt cucullam.” (Salmasius’s note.)—So the very “caracalla” of St. Alban is called “cuculla” by the middle ages. (Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 184, and Usher, 78.

* Ibid. ibid.: “Caracallæ, de quibus Beatus Hieronymus, erant palamæ cum cucullis, qualia monachi et ασκηται gerebant.”—Usher, 78: “Hieronymus (epist. 128, ad Fabiolam) et Eucherius (Instruction. lib. ii. cap. 10) indumentum sacerdotale—in modum caracallæ fuisse dicunt, sed sine cuculla,” and so “caracallas fuisse” then “—cucullatas” satis indicant.”

† Concilia, i. 117, Penitential of Archbishop Egbert, canon ix. The translation is thus in Latin: “Cum sacerdos missam celebrat, non portet caracallam cassiatam; sed, cum Evangelium legit, imponat eam humero.” The translation should have been merely caracalla cassiam.

‡ Spartian, ix. Hist. Aug. Script. 417; Dio, 1311, notes.

own name from Casag, Casog, a term equally Celtic with the other, equally applied by the Gauls to that garment assuredly, and still used in the Highlands for a coat or a cassock §. But that the cassock of modern times is the same with the caracalla of the ancient, is shewn historically by Bede, an “ancient author,” overlooked by Bingham; for Bede speaks “of it as” a “clerical habit in those days” of Dioclesian himself, and even as the “peculiar habit of the clergy” then. In his account of that proto-martyr of Britain, whose name we so justly revere, at the grand persecution of Christianity under Dioclesian, “Albanus, still a pagan,” he says, “received into his house a certain clergyman flying from the “persecutors.” This clergyman converted and baptized him, in the course of a few days; at the end of which, some soldiers came to search the house for the clergyman. Then, warmed with a flame of generous friendship for his spiritual father, “Albanus presented himself to the “soldiery for his guest and teacher, clad in his habit, that is, in the “CARACALLA with which HE was drest; and was carried bound to the “judge ||.” Here we observe clergymen in that very early period of British Christianity, in the very moments of persecuting heathenism, wearing the discriminative habit of their profession in a cassock, and wearing it so publicly, so regularly, that a layman by putting it on, perhaps too by concealing his face in the hood, could pass for a clergyman. In this little anecdote, as in a glass, we see the early origin of our clerical cassocks, and we behold the early appropriation of cassocks to us clergymen. From that period we trace the cassock under this Roman-Gallic appellation of caracalla, as appearing for ages in use among the clergy. We find it worn by an abbot in France during the

§ Hence casog mharcahd in Erse, a riding-coat; and a cassock is, by Shaw’s Erse Dictionary, 1780, rendered casag. Casul in Welsh, which originally signified a chesuble only, has latterly been used, from mere assimilation of sound, to signify a cassock as well as a chesuble.

|| Bede Hist. i. 7: “Albanus, paganus ad huc,—clericum quendam persecutores fugientem hospitio recepit—. Se Sanctus Albanus pro hospite et magistro suo, ipsius habitu, id est, caracallâ quâ vestiebatur, indutus, militibus exhibuit, atque ad judicem “vinctus productus est.”

fifth

fifth century*. We find it noticed on St. Alban himself by king Alfred, in his translation of Bede's account; for a "monk's habit †." We also behold it noticed on St. Alban again, by a monk of his abbey, under the fourteenth; in an express reference to that title of a caracalla, which was still popular for it, and with all that easy familiarity, with which an historical clergyman would speak of a cassock at present ‡. But it is finally noticed by a writer of the sixteenth, upon one who was an English clergyman of Cornwall, in the ninth; yet no longer indeed under the title of a caracalla; for what it is still worn among the clergy, as "an interior tunic §." On the statue of Germanus it is not so worn, because this statue is monastically dressed, and has only one garment. By the Cornish abbot above, however, it was worn just as it is by the clergy at present, as a garment under a gown; the toga being equally retained from the Romans among us, but retained with all a Roman's reverence for it, as an upper robe for the clergy, and as an upper mantle for magistracy. The great difference in dress then between the monastic and the common divine was this at last; that the cassock was worn by the former, as in the statue of Germanus, bound with a sash as we now bind it; and that the latter equally wore it bound, but with a gown flowing loosely over it. Yet there was also another difference, of a slighter quality indeed, but more noticed by the eye of the world. St. Jerome, as I have already observed, speaks of the caracalla as then furnished with a hood, and then used by monks. The hood was then beginning to be dropped by the common clergy, and to be continued only by the monks. The hood was so continued in fact till the Reformation, the monastic statue of St. Germanus (as I have said before) having a hood strikingly apparent. Hence the cucullus or cowl has become at this day the appropriate badge of a monk. And hence a bishop of Winchester, in the reign of Edgar, when he wanted

* "Dans le cinquieme siecle Saint Oyan, abbé de Condat, avoit un de ces habillemens." (Bullet, ii. 276.)

† Bede, 477: "Munuc gegýpelan."

‡ M. Paris, 997: "Quendam panniculum—, ipsum—Beati Amphibali—caracallam; —in—panniculo quem caracallam vocant."

§ Leland's Coll. iv. 3: "Tunicam interiorem."

to change the clergymen of his cathedral into monks, came into the quire just before the service began, with a number of "cowled cassocks" in the arms of a servant; ordered the clergy there assembled for the service, to "throw off their clerical habit," in throwing off their uncowled cassock with their gown, and actually inducing some of them to strip for assuming "the monastic garment †." Nor can I refrain from expressing my wish, at the close, that the cassock, long or short, the caracalla, as used short by the Gauls, or as lengthened out by Antoninus ‡, was still the discriminating habit of the clergy in these moments of peace; when it was worn at a period, in which it became the very mark for persecution, the very attractor to the lightning of it §.

The parish thus distinguished by the name, thus revering the memory, and thus honouring the statue of that genuine saint, Germanus, became the largest in Cornwall, being reckoned to be seven miles in length, half as many in breadth, and twenty in circumference ||. Yet the population of the whole is still slender; all the houses within the

† Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii. 219: "Paratis quamplurimis monachorum cucullis, die quo communio—cantabatur chorum intravit, vestes quas paraverat secum deferri faciens.— Igitur (inquit)—apprehendite—vestem monachilem.— Nonnulli ex illis statim, abjecto "clericali habitu, monachi facti sunt."

‡ Spartian, 416, 417: "Vestimento—demisso usque ad talos (quod antè non fuerat), unde hodieque Antoninianæ dicuntur caracallæ hujusmodi," so long.

§ Salmasius asserts the caracalla to have always had a hood or cowl, "Nunquam caracalla "sine cucullâ;" and Bullet derives the very name from the circumstance, "Car, tête, Cal, "couverture." But, as there is not a shadow of authority for giving hoods to the caracallas of Antoninus, or of Gaul, so Bullet's derivation is not of the slightest consequence. He has played his gambols too much in this fairy land of his, to be respectable in derivations. The original word I believe to be still preserved in Erse, and to be its Carachulhamh, an upper garment, which in pronunciation (I apprehend) would be sounded like Carachulla; and to be radically the same with Carrugh, Carruch (A.), Corwug, Corwgl, Curwgl, or Curagl (W.), a coracle, Celtic words signifying leather (Hist. of Man^r. ii. quarto, 300-302), that first material used in making garments, and that which has peculiarly lent, in Malmesbury, 122, Saville, &c. the title of super-pelliccum, or surplice, to the garment worn over the cassock in divine offices.

|| Willis, 147.

compass of it, even those of the very village included, being computed not long ago to be less than three hundred and thirty ¶. A plant set late in the season, is always backward in its advances; unless some peculiar richness of soil, or some peculiar art of improvement, lends it an extraordinary growth. But what additionally proves the parish to have been later in time than its neighbours; Coldrinneck, though all in the parish, and paying all its small tithes to the church of St. German's, yet pays its great to the church or parish of Mynheniot, and so shews itself to have been formerly a member of Mynheniot.

The church of St. German's, then, was parochial before it became episcopal. Cut off as the Cornish were from their original bishop and see at Exeter, by the Saxon reduction of East-Devonshire; they were to form a new bishop, and to fix a new see for themselves. But, on the plan of settling both in a village preferably to a town, no church could be selected for the settlement of both in it, except what was previously parochial. That this was actually the case at St. German's, is finally apparent from the very church itself. Constructed as the old part evidently was for a bishop, it was as evidently constructed upon the site of a preceding church. On the eastern face of the southern tower, is a plain water-table at present; projecting from the very stones of the tower, to cover the junction of the roof with them; and now standing above the present roof, even two or three feet above it. This proves the tower, as it contains six bells at present, to have been the campanile of a previous church; and to have had the present church attached to it, when the previous was rebuilt for the cathedral of Cornwall. But this cathedral appears to have been lower in the roof, than the merely parochial church before, by all the distance between the present roof and the ancient water-table. Built during the last moments of Roman residence in this island, or just after the Roman departure out of it, the parochial was raised probably with some of the Roman loftiness of architecture. But when the cathedral came to be built, two ages of trouble and anguish and desolation had passed, over all the regions of the Roman empire. The tide of conquest, that had once flowed on so vigorously from Italy, that had long reached its highest water-mark, and now been at a full stand for some time; receded rapidly, leaving those shores of Britain, which it had covered so usefully with its waters, to be possessed by sea-monsters of the foulest kind. The cathedral therefore partook in this humiliated state of Britain; rose not, though a cathedral, to so lofty a pitch as the parochial church before; and would indeed have certainly taken the parochial for its own uses, if this had not necessarily wanted what was considered as essential to a cathedral, what in fact lent it its very denomination of a cathedral, a cathedra or throne for the bishop in the eastern wall of it.

From the sight of our cathedrals in England, less august indeed than the cathedrals of France or Italy, yet grand in their dimensions and dignified in their architecture; we are inclined, in the obsequiousness of intellect to perception, to expect an amplitude of size, a loftiness of ceiling, and a mode of construction happily bold or venerably extravagant in itself,

Snatching a grace beyond the reach of art;

when a cathedral is placed before us. But from the spirit, predominant at one time, of placing cathedrals in villages; we find our ideas of cathedrals considerably lowered, and are led to expect a cathedral even less august in England, than a cathedral is in Wales at present. So in Leland we read this account, of what was once a cathedral at Sherborne, in Dorsetshire: "the body of the abbaye chirch dedicate to our Lady," the church being, like our own at St. German's, both abbatial and cathedral, "servid "ontille a hunderith yeres syns, for the chife parochie chirch of the "town," and thus was equally parochial too with our own*. In so many points extraordinary does this church coincide with St. German's! Yet even this parochial, abbatial, and cathedral church, remained within a hundred years before Leland's visit, roofed in part with mere thatch. "A preste of Al-Halowis," says the same author, "shot a shaft with "fier into the toppe of that part of S. Mary chirch, that devidid the est

* Itin. ii. 76.

" part,

“part, that the monkes usid, from [that] the townesmen usid; and “this partition, chauncing at that tyme to be thakkid yn the rofe,” though it was not in Leland’s, “was sette a fier; and consequently al “the hole chirch (the lede and belles melted) was defacid †.” Such was Sherborne cathedral then; while St. German’s was as much superior to it as our English cathedral is to a Welsh one at present ‡!

In thus building the parochial church of St. German’s at first, it was from such a physical principle of attention, as we have previously seen giving name at a very early period to the Damnonii of Devonshire §, and as the necessities of local situation compel the Cornish to observe at this day; fixed by the king of Cornwall upon the eastern side of a hill, in order to guard it from the rifling winds, to which all Cornwall is exposed from its pointed projection into the vast Atlantic on the west. A house also was constructed for the rector, upon the same principle, at a point lower on the side of the hill, though not so low as what was afterwards the ground of the priory. When lord Eliot rebuilt the church-front of the priory some years ago, he dug a hollow way along this front, large enough to admit the passage of a cart; he formed vaults in the ground towards the church, ample enough to contain the wood or the coals requisite for the use of the family; covered over the arched roofs with turf; and only threw light into those by several grates in these. In this operation, he discovered what were clearly the foundations of the rectory-house. The ground, as far as the work proceeded towards the church, appeared full of walls, ranging in all directions. but all laid invariably in a mode, very different from the manner of the present times, very different from the manner observed in the foundations of the priory, but the very same as is frequently seen in the walls of the Romans among us, upon two or three courses of stones placed edgewise, or (as the mode has been properly denominated for the sake of distinction) in the herring-bone fashion. So strikingly does this † Ilin. ii. 77.

‡ So the cathedral of Norwich was ambulatory to the reign of Rufus, and was sometimes fixed “in vico qui Elmham dicitur, in sacello ligneo.” (Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 407.)

§ Ch. i. s. 2.

discovery come in to confirm my general train of reasoning here, to fix on the ground a rectory-house antecedent to the priory, to give it almost all the ground betwixt the priory and the church, and to leave only a way of access to the chapels in the north aisle of the latter. The churchyard, therefore, extended only to the east, the west, and the south of the church; and for that reason continued to extend so, even within our own days. Such was the state of the ground when Athelstan came to St. German's. Then he preserved probably a part of the rectory-house, certainly left the foundations of it to rest in the ground, and raised his priory lower down the hill, partly upon rock, partly upon sea-beach, and all at the head of that little bay, which nature had there formed as a diverticulum from Tiddiford creek. By this the tide came up from the creek and the Liner to the very foot of the priory walls; and, in recovering this from the dominion of the salt-water, lord Eliot has lately won twenty-five acres of land. Even within these very few years a building remained upon the site of the rectory-house, running out at right angles from the western end of the church-front of the priory, stretching up towards the church itself, and being perhaps the last remains of the rectory-house; perhaps the old hall of the house, as the whole was a long narrow room, used only for a laundry. Besides this, there was even a garden upon the ground, commonly denominated the Church-garden, and the aged representative of the rectorial probably.

Thus occupied by a garden and buildings was the ground on the north side of the church; and the churchyard was necessarily thrown to the other sides, reaching out on the east up to the end of the present lawn, and ranging on the west up to an ash-tree there. But lord Eliot, a few years ago, induced the late bishop Keppel, and the late chancellor Carrington, to have the whole of the churchyard levelled on the east and west, to prohibit sepulture for the future in any part of it, and to order a new burying-ground for the parish at a little distance. This was a great point gained for the accommodation of aspect to the priory, as well as for the convenience of dryness to the church. Solely to this improvement do we also owe some discoveries related before, and the priory

priory now, for the first time, turned its face upon the church. The rectorial house, from its close vicinity to the church, assuredly turned its front away from it, and faced about to the bay. The priory certainly did. This, adds Mr. Willis, in 1716, “ fronts to the river,—and has a “ court before it, adorned with a strong pier by the present proprietor, “ Edward Eliot, esq.—against the banks of the river *.” It was forced to front so, by the rectory-house interposing betwixt it and the church, so coming closely to it. It therefore turned its back upon the church, and presented its face to the bay. The prospect on that side was all obstructed, but on this was open and large. Yet now, when the back-front has been rebuilt by lord Eliot, when it has been lengthened out at one end into a long gallery for pictures, when this has been made the general sitting-room of the family, and when it necessarily looks out towards the church; the back-front has become in effect the principal one, and has assumed all the consequence that its position originally challenged for it. Another point, however, was still wanting to the perfection of the whole. The unsightliness of the churchyard from the windows, had become more than ever an object of moment to my lord’s taste, and had, therefore, been removed by my lord’s management. But now the last remains of the rectorial house were torn down, the rectorial garden was destroyed, and the churchyard in view was all levelled into a lawn with the ground of both.

Yet curiosity is willing to ask, and vivacity is eager to answer, what was the form of a rectorial house generally in these ages. We cannot indeed turn up the ground here, in order to trace the dimensions of the substance by the outlines of the shadow, and ascertain the rooms by the foundations. These are now all removed, and the knowledge which they could communicate has vanished with them. Yet we have a resource still left for information, on this hitherto unexplored point. The sun often ministers his light by the moon, when he himself has sunk in the ocean. We have a rectorial house still existing within the county, still shewing all the greatness with all the littleness of an-ancient parsonage, being the latest perhaps that was ever built upon the ancient model, and so standing the fair representative of all the ancient at present.

* Willis, 149, 150.

“Contiguous with the churchyard” of Saint Columb, says Hals, “was a college of black monks or canons Augustine, consisting of three fellows, for instructing youth in the liberal arts and sciences*.” This author must always be allowed some confusion of ideas; and he here confounds objects that are very distinct, fellows, canons, and monks, by turning his “three fellows” as reported to him (I suppose) from some seeming tradition, into canons or monks, as seemingly reported to him by history. For “I take it,” as he adds immediately, “to be one of those three colleges in this province, named in Speed and Dugdale’s Monasticon, whose revenues they do not express, nor the places where they were extant; but tell us, that they were dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary, the lady of angels, and were black monks of the Augustines†.” He thus builds an assertion bold and positive, on a surmise frivolous and false. But he must frequently be allowed something more than confusion, even an unfaithfulness to his very authorities, a citation of testimonies directly opposed to him, or a falsification of them for serving his own purpose. Accordingly “those three colleges in this province, named in—Dugdale’s Monasticon,” as consisting of “black monks of the Augustines,” are actually three thus noted there,

“Can. S. A. Bodmyn Pr. 270 - 0 - 11

“Can. S. A. Lanceston Abb. 354 - 0 - 11

“Can. S. A. S. Germani Abb. 213. 243 - 8 - 0 ‡”

Where their “revenues” are all expressed, and their “places” are all specified. The college of St. Columb, therefore, cannot possibly be one of the three; being no abbey of either black or white monks, and no priory of either Augustinians or Dominicans. In fact it was merely the PARSONAGE-HOUSE, denominated a cottage here, as I believe such houses, or their sites, to be still denominated in various parts of England; and as I particularly remember the site of one to be denominated at Eccles, near Manchester. A parsonage-house, indeed, was called a college originally, because it contained a collegiate kind of family, and a collegiate kind of school within it.

* Hals, 62.

† Ibid. ibid.

‡ Monasticon, i. 1039.

“The retainers of the church,” I have said formerly concerning every parish-priest among the Saxons, “consisted of six persons under the rector, the deacon, sub-deacon, and acolyth, the exorcist, lector, and ostiary:” but “the priest and deacon only were reputed to be in holy orders; the rest were denominated clerks, and even in contradistinction to these, and have transmitted the name to their successors, the parish-clerks of the present period; and, as they assisted in the services of religion, they had seats in the chancel with both, and their stalls remain in many old parish-churches at present.” There “they have frequently induced our antiquaries, without reason, without authority, and in mere ignorance of the ancient custom, to suppose the churches to have been formerly *collegiated.” So I once said without any the slightest knowledge of the present case, yet with a seemingly pointed reference to it; I said so merely from the canons of the Saxons, and from the constitutions of the French cotemporary with them. Thus, then, were formed those first colleges of clergy in our island, the immediate parents of what we have denominated colleges since, and stamping a parental likeness upon their progeny; these being several priests incorporated into a society for the service of a church, while those were merely the laical retainers of the church under the deacon and priest of it: both, however, were societies regularly collegiated, and both resided in what were popularly entitled colleges. “The same custom” also “prevailed in France; mention being incidentally made” in the capitula of the Franks, “of the ‘clericos quos secum habent presbyteri’ †.”

But there was another circumstance in these parsonage-houses which united with the preceding to gain them the appellation of colleges. Each house was a college or school for education. “The clerks” in it, as I

* Hist. of Manchester, ii. quarto, 427.

† Ibid. 430.

equally noted once, “were all destined for holy orders; each priest “ was previously a clerk; and persons were gradually promoted through “ every of the inferior offices, to the diaconate and priesthood. The “ proper instruction of them for orders was committed to the care of “ the priest, as the education of youth in the monasteries was consigned “ to the abbot; and the priest and abbot, therefore, were equally denomi- “ nated the rector or governor.” Hence then is derived that very appellation for a beneficed parish-priest among us, which is the most ancient in origin, most dignified in sound, and most advantageous in revenue; which we naturally consider as relative to his parish, but here find referring merely to his school. Nor was this all the school that a parish-priest kept in his house; he “ had other pupils with his clerks: his house, “ in reality, was a little academy for the sons of the neighbouring gentry; “ as the bishop’s was another and a greater. This curious and unnoticed “ particular appears plainly in the Saxon constitutions. Let the bishops “ willingly teach schools and instruct, says the twenty-sixth ecclesiastical law of Canute; and let every priest have a school in his house, “ says the twentieth canon of Theodulf. The bishops, abbots, and “ rectors, are required as early as 747, to keep their families in continual “ application to reading; and for that purpose to confine the boys to the “ schools, and train them up to the law of sacred knowledge; that, being “ thus instructed, they may become in all respects useful to the house of “ God, and the spiritual ornaments of it. And if any good man will “ send his children to the priest, says another canon of a later date, the “ *priest ought to teach them willingly, not expecting any reward from “ their relations, except what they voluntarily give.” We even find the same practice on the continent, mention being incidentally made in the capitula of the Franks, not merely concerning the “ clericos quos “ secum habent presbyteri,” but also of the “ scholarios” that every presbyter had; and some directions being given for the government of these schools†.

So diffused over the continent, equally with the island, this primitive provision for the elementary or the plenary education of our youths, we may be sure continued for ages afterward in both; even till other societies were formed, and other buildings erected under the retained appellation of colleges, for the more formal, more public, more general purposes of education. We accordingly see it continued for the elementary in this very college at St. Columb, even beyond the erection of such buildings, and the formation of such societies. "In this college," notes Mr. Hals, very happily from private information, "temp. Henry VI. was bred up John Arundell," bishop of Exeter, "a younger son of Renphrey Arundell of Lanherne, esq. sheriff of Cornwall 3 Edward IV.; where he had his first taste of the liberal arts and sciences, and was afterwards placed at Exon college in Oxford; where he stayd till he took his degree of Master of Arts, and then was presented by his father to John Booth bishop of Exon, to be consecrated priest, and to have collation, institution, and induction into his rectory of St. Columb, which" was "accordingly performed*." So long did the parsonage-house continue to include clerks, with others, in a collegiate society and a collegiate school within it: the clerks were training certainly for orders, and all the others were assuredly so. Nor did the school cease entirely at the parsonage-house, as we see from this anecdote; till grammar-schools (so public and endowed buildings for teaching the two languages of literary antiquity were now called) arose from the beneficence, and were kept under the patronage, of bishops or of rectors, by the side of their cathedrals in cities, or near to their parish-churches in towns. Even then the clerical schools, which in the reduction of rectories into vicarages, and the consequent contraction in the size of the priest's house, must have been frequently kept in the churches themselves, were in the churches kept still, and are so kept at various parishes of Cornwall to this day. In this very parish of St. Columb, where no such reduction has taken place, and the parsonage-house still exhibits its big bulk to the eye, we find the school transferred to the church, and the transfer proved by a melancholy incident; as "in the year 1676," we read in Hals, "the greatest part of this church of St. Columb was casually blown up with gun-

* Hist. of Manchester, ii. quarto, 428.

† Ibid. 430.

* Hals, 63.

“ powder, by three youths of the town, scholars therein, who, in the “ absence of their master and the rest of their companions, ignorantly set “ fire to a barrel of gunpowder, the parish-stores, laid up in the stone “ stairs and walls of the rood-loft†.” The private schools, too, that are now kept by clergymen all over the kingdom, are derived equally from the ancient institution of a school in every parsonage-house; the boarders yet forming a sort of collegiate society, and the pupils yet composing a sort of collegiate school within the walls of the house. Only the masters are bound down no longer, as the rectors of well-endowed churches were formerly, and as the masters of well-endowed schools are from them at present, to act “ not expecting any reward “ from their relations, except what they voluntarily give;” but are obliged to stipulate with the relations precisely, and compelled to require remunerations from them periodically.

Such, then, was the college at St. Columb, the parsonage-house of the parish, a society of clerks, and a school for education! The name, however, remains only in the site; yet the circumstances of the site confirm the truth of my reasonings. It is about an acre of ground, encircled on every side by the glebe, as having been originally the central part of it; it lies close along the western side of the churchyard, and is accessible only across the churchyard itself, or by a lane leading down to the church-stile. Near the union of this lane with the churchyard, and pushing up to the college, are the rector’s barn and the rector’s mowhay at present, this for stacking his corn in mows, that for threshing it out into grain, in the still-existing mode of Cornish husbandry. These are on the southern side of the college, while on the northern is what was formerly denominated the college mowhay, what is so denominated in a terrier as late as 1727, but is popularly called the college meadow at present, *a field still belonging to the rectory. The college itself,

† Hals, 62.

* The very terms of the terrier are these: “ A meadow called the court park, or church “ meadow,” now the parsonage meadow; but by its ancient name evincing the college to have been also called the court, “ bounded with the houses that were lately Geo. Cham“ pion’s,

itself, however, is now annexed to the manor; the Arundels, I suppose, like some other patrons of churches, having considered patronage to mean pillage, yet beginning with petty peculations of sacrilege upon the church committed to their protection; first leasing the site, probably from the rector, on a small acknowledgment of rent, as they have leased some garden-grounds adjoining, and then urging their tenants of that, as by report they are now urging their tenants of these, to refuse all payment to the rector. To know the process used in past depredations upon the church, we must look to the course pursued in the present; such selfishness always crawling like a snail in one slimy path, yet moving slowly in its progress from a fear of sacrilege, and generally skulking under cover in a dread of detection. This house is traditionally reported to have ranged along the southern side of the ground, but must certainly have covered it all nearly, and could have ranged on that side merely in the final remains of it: there, however, the remains continued in a fair form of building, though used only for the meanest of offices, till the commencement of the eighteenth century. "It happened," adds Hals, "a poor youth of Bridport, in Dorset, about eighteen years old, in the month of July, anno 1701, travelling into those parts in quest of service, applied to one Mrs. Crews, of Colomb town," then inhabiting the end house on the west, at the great church-stile, "who had possession of those houses," as still several rooms, "for her alms and a night's lodging, who accordingly ordered her servant Gilbert to place him in some of the college-houses, made stables of; who at night, with a lanthorn and candle," though in July, necessary therefore from the darkness of the rooms, "conducted him to the same; and having some occasion that called him thence, before the young man had prepared his bed, left the lanthorn and candle in the stable, and went forth thence, locking the door thereof, and carrying with him the key, and told the youth that in short time he would return thither again, and fetch the lanthorn. But it happened the young man fell asleep, and his guardian keeper neglecting to come as he promised.

"pion's, and the houses of Richard Calloway on the east, the college mowhay on the south, and the glebe lands on the west and north." The knowledge of these I owe to the obliging spirit of the Rev. Mr. Paul, of St. Columb, now rector of Mawgan adjoining.

“ the candle (it seems) burnt through the lanthorn, and set fire to the straw and hay in that place, and so kindled into a great flame, which approaching the lad as he slept, awaked him, who in vain ran to the doors and windows, [the latter] barred with iron, in order to make his escape; but he could by no means get out at either, neither could the townsmen that came to quench the fire at night use any means by force to open the door ;” only one door now noticed, as only one before, though doors in the plural are noticed between, therefore a pair of folding doors probably; “ the party that had the key, as aforesaid, “ being wanting,” and “ no person knowing whither he was gone; “ neither did he appear till the whole college-houses were in a raging flame of fire, which consumed them and the youth together*.” That last remainder of the ancient college of St. Columb, appears from this, the sole account which we have of it, to have been a room with only one door to it, but to have had other rooms adjoining, yet all accessible only from that; to have had windows barred so closely with iron, as to prevent all passage through them; to have had a door likewise so strong in its substance, that no violence from without could break it down; and to have equally had a lock so massy in its bolts, with hinges so tenacious in their hold, that the violence which could not break down the door, could as little force the fastenings upon it. All these circumstances combine to shew us, that the room, which from its position appears to have extended east and west, was what we shall see in a structure immediately succeeding this, the chapel of the college, still entered by its original door, now partitioned off in its length into several rooms, but having its passage into them successively through the first. Nor do any the slightest remains of this building now appear above ground, its garden only remaining upon the western side of the site, there extending along the side with its ancient fence of a wall, even still exhibiting an ancient face in a part of the wall, and in the relics of a buttress six feet wide†.

Yet when did this college, so turned into stables, and so consumed by flames, cease to be the parsonage-house? The very man, who is the last known pupil of the college, is the first of the rectors who lived out of it, by transferring the parsonage-house to its present site. He being "resident," says Hals, "upon this rectory [rectory's] glebe lands;" that is, in this very college in which he was educated, "gave him "opportunity to build the old parsonage-house still extant thereon, and "moated the same round with rivers and fish-ponds, as sir John Arundel, "knt. informed me."* He thus removed the house from its vicinity to the church and the town, from its airy elevation upon a height, and from an elevation rendered more airy by the sweeping of the winds around the obstructing church, to a position still upon the glebe, still near to the church, but sequestered from the town, and lying snug in a romantic valley. This valley is just at the back of the church, narrow in its dimensions, formed by two parallel ranges of gently swelling hills, and watered at one of them by a lively brook. Here the rector placed his new house, occupying the whole breadth of the valley, standing directly at the foot of an oblique descent from the church-hill, and having the rest of the valley extended in length before it. But he "moated not the same round" in a love of pleasure, as Willis states him to have done, "with rivers and fishponds;" nor did he moat it about, as others may surmise, in a military mode for security; but he laid out the ground in that castellated style of grandeur which was adopted by the gentry and imitated by the clergy; several parsonage-houses in the kingdom being equally moated, I believe, and one at Warrington, in Lancashire, being partially moated still, I know. He then walled up the sides equally with the bottom of the moat, throwing (as tradition reports, as symmetry requires, and as the piers still indicate) a drawbridge across it in front, before it erecting a gateway that remained a few years ago all mantled over with ivy; and deriving into it, not "rivers," as Hals in the usual exaggerations of childishness writes, but the lively brook above mentioned. Yet what is much more remarkable in itself, more level with our present course of observations, and more striking from the castellated form before, he laid out the house on a plan of disposition within, adapted to all the forms of a college; and it stands, as I have noted before, a fine model of the primitive colleges, or ancient parsonage-houses of this island. In front it has a porch, not set in the middle, but very much upon one side, the south; and a lobby runs from it, leaving three rooms on the left, with a hall on the right: these constitute two sides of a narrow oblong quadrangle behind, of which the other sides are constituted by the old kitchen, the back-kitchen, the grand staircase, and some rooms above. The three on the left of the lobby, I apprehend to have been the school for the clerks or pupils, and the parlour for the rector; as the first room, now partitioned slightly into two, shews an old doorway without in the wall where the chimney is, and as close to the porch within is a small private staircase in the thick wall, now from the lobby, but formerly (I believe) from the room, ascending up to chambers overhead: the first chamber into which this brings us still exhibits that large arch of its original window, which is known to have turned the pipe of the inserted chimney upon one side. From this we mount by three steps into the chamber over the porch, as we equally ascended once by a single step through a doorway now blocked up, but still evident, into another chamber: the first, therefore, was the dormitory of the pupils or clerks, I apprehend; the second of the deacon presiding immediately over them; and the third of the rector presiding over all. The old kitchen is still marked out to the eye of curiosity by rising all open to the roof, and by shewing a broad tall arch filled up with stone, so resting upon a thick transome beam of timber, and in the Cornish fashion, having two divisions below, one for boiling, the other for roasting: The back-kitchen carries a chamber over it for the only servants then admitted into a parsonage-house, the men; and a stone staircase still remains at one corner ascending up to it. The only side unnoticed is a square kind of turret-like structure, containing the grand staircase up to a bed-room that was reserved for the bishop or the archdeacon, probably at the respective visitation of each. Such was the general disposition of the house, all collegiate in its figure! But its figure was more collegiate still. Facing the staircase was a few years ago a doorway into the hall. This room, rising all open to the roof like the kitchen, was calculated for the dining-room of the house, and by its length became the medium of connexion to the whole, that by which the communication between the grand staircase, the kitchen, the back-kitchen, and the lobby was kept up. It remains in all its original dimensions at present, long, large, and lofty; so seems to give some scope for that charge of luxury which men sitting loose to religion, therefore sure lovers of luxury themselves, affect at times to fix upon the richer clergy. But such a size of a dining-room is no argument of luxury practised in it; it only formed a part of the collegiate economy then, as it forms in our universities now; it was then as necessary for the collegiate family as it is now; and it was then balanced, as it now is, by a chapel of equal dimensions. Up the grand staircase in our present parsonage-house, and close to the grand bed-room, is a room on the same floor with it, running east and west, lofty, long, and broad, coved overhead, pushing up to the front of the house, even projecting a little beyond it, and having a large window there; the unknown, the unsuspected, yet the certain chapel of the whole. This, therefore, was built at a period when, as in our colleges of Oxford and Cambridge at present, religion was considered to be the grand duty of life, when domestic religion was carefully cultivated in clerical houses, and when this was thought to be the most efficaciously exercised by those houses which could afford the convenience within a room appropriated entirely to the purpose. But as religion was made to stoop from its elevation, as domestic religion became less cultivated, and as the pomp of devoutness sunk away into the pride of life, the chapel either became a room for receiving tithe-renters, even though the hall presented itself as peculiarly calculated for the purpose, or was partitioned into two bedrooms, with a new window struck out on the north for lighting one of them, or was formed as now into a drawing-room. Thus also has the school been partitioned into a parlour and a pantry, while the hall is modelled into another parlour, the passage through the length of it being supplied by a lobby at the back of it; the rector's parlour has been changed into a kitchen, the rector's bed-room into a maid-servant's, and the deacon's into a footman's; the chamber for the men-servants being unoccupied, with that for the clerks or pupils, while the bishop's or archdeacon's bed-room has received two stories of rooms over it, but still shews the seam of conjunction on the north wall without.

* Hals, 63.

† From the Rev. Mr. Paul I derive the local notices.

* Hals, 63.

out. In this manner has the ancient and venerable form of a collegiate house been softened down a little into the fashion of a modern parsonage, yet still retains enough of its ancient form to be still venerable in its aspect; and when the veil is drawn aside from the glass, as it now for the first time is, still presents to the eye all the solemn features of a once collegiate parsonage, such as the college was by the church at St. Columb, and such as the parsonage-house equally was, we may be sure by the church at St. German's.

SECTION II.

I HAVE mentioned the southern tower of the church a little above, as the campanile of the church erected before the present nave of 936, erected before the present south aisle of about 614, erected indeed so early as about 450. Nor let me be supposed, in mentioning this, to be confounding the order of chronology, and antedating by some ages the introduction of bell-towers: I am not in my own belief, and here engage to prove I am not in fact.

We have been told, indeed, that bell-towers were first annexed to our churches in the tenth century, or possibly in the ninth; but we have been told so by an author that seems never to have had any right of dictating, that however has been allowed to do so by the constitutional timidity of scholars, and that I have repeatedly convicted of folly before. Let me now convict him finally. "It is highly probable," says Mr. Bentham, "that the use of bells gave occasion to the first and "most considerable alteration that was made in the general plan of our "churches, by the necessity it induced of having strong and high-raised "edifices for their reception. The æra, indeed, of the invention of "bells is somewhat obscure* ; and it must be owned that some traces

* "Vide Spelmanni Gloss. ad Campana."

“ of them may be discovered in our monasteries, even in the seventh century *; yet, I believe, one may venture to assert that such large ones as required distinct buildings for their support, do not appear to have been in use among us till the tenth century, about the middle of which we find several of our churches were furnished with them by the munificence of our kings †. And the account we have of St. Dunstan’s gifts to Malmesbury abbey by their historian,” he means that excellent historian William of Malmesbury abbey, “ plainly shews they were not very common in that age,” of so great size, as he should have added; “ for,” he says, “ the liberality of that prelate consisted chiefly in such things as were then wonderful and strange in England, among which he reckons the large bells—he gave them ‡: but from this period,” the tenth century, “ they became more frequent, and in time the common furniture to our churches. Bells, no doubt, at first suggested the necessity of towers; towers promised to the imagination something noble and extraordinary, in the uncommon effects they were capable of producing by their requisite loftiness and variety of forms: the hint was improved, and towers were built not only for necessary use, but often for symmetry and ornament in different parts of the fabric, and particularly when the plan of a cross was adopted. —This is the short history of the origin of towers and steeples—. Possibly these innovations might begin under king Alfred,” in the ninth cen- tury*. But this history of their origin is as untrue as it is contradictory; Mr. Bentham having said at the beginning, "I believe one may venture to assert, that such large bells as required distinct buildings for their support, do not appear to have been in use among us till the tenth century," yet resaying at the close, that "possibly these innovations might begin" in the ninth; asserting also that "bells, no doubt, at first suggested the necessity of towers;" but instantly adding, that "towers promised to the imagination," consequently before they were built, "something noble and extraordinary in the uncommon effects they were capable of producing," not by the sound of the bells from them, but "by their requisite loftiness and variety of forms;" he thus ascribing towers to bells and to necessity, then reascribing them to an imagined anticipation of their beauty, and being grossly erroneous in all. His very progress of improvement is retrograde in itself; while his course, either retrograde or progressive, is all an aberration from the truth.

* “ Bedæ Hist. lib. iv. cap. 23.”

† “ ‘ Ethelstanus rex (circa A. D. 935) dedit quatuor magnas campanas Sto. Cuthberto.’ Monast. Angl. vol. i. pag. 40. lin. 52.—‘ Rex Eadredus duo signa non modica ecclesiæ Eboracensi donavit.’ Math. West. ad annum 946.—Rex Edgarus, circa A. D. 974, ecclesiæ Ramesiensi dedit—‘ duas campanas, 20 librarum pretio comparatas.’ Hist. Ramesien. cap. xxii. edit. Gale.”

‡ “ S. Dunstanus,—‘ in multis loco [locis] munificens, quæ tunc in Anglâ magni miraculi essent, decusque et ingenium conferentis [ostenderent], offerre crebrò; inter quæ, signa sono et mole præstantia.—’ Will. Malmesb. de Pontif. lib. v. edit. Angl. Sacr. vol. ii. pag. 23.—‘ Dunstanus, cujus industriâ reffloruit ecclesia [Glaston.],—fecit—signa duo præcipua, et campanam in refectorio.’ Will. Malmesb. de Antiq. Glaston. Eccles. pag. 324, edit. Galei.—Athelwoldus abbas monasterii de Abendone, regnante Edgardo rege, ‘ fecit duas campanas, quæ in domo [Dei] posuit, cum aliis duabus, quas B. Dunstanus fecisse perhibetur.’ Vid. Monast. Angl. vol. i. pag. 995, lin. 42.”

The first towers to our churches undoubtedly were towers for bells. The very form of these tall and hollow cylinders of stone proves this to every eye; nor could any idea of the ornamental nature of towers to churches ever have been adopted, till towers had been constructed for use, till the mind had contemplated their utility, and the eye had begun to perceive their elegance or grandeur: all church-towers, therefore, were bell-towers at first, and the origin of these is the commencement of those. But when did towers commence at our churches? in the tenth century, in the ninth, or in what? To ascertain this, we must recur to the origin of bells themselves, not as noted by Mr. Bentham, but as standing on the records of history. These bells do not merely shew "some traces" of themselves, "in our monasteries, even in the seventh century;" they came in with the Romans, were introduced into use among us from the Romans, and had even towers erected for them at our churches by the Romans. These will seem paradoxical assertions, I doubt not, to all those who have only half thought, and only half inquired, concerning the origin of bells and bell-towers; even to the great mass of antiquaries in the nation. But I undertake to substantiate their truth, by positive facts.

* Bentham's Ely, 29, 30.

Suetonius informs us in a passage, replete with intelligence peculiarly curious to the antiquary of manners, that “when Augustus,” in a personal attention to public devoutness, which appears striking to a religious mind even at present, “repaired every day to the temple of Jupiter Tonans, which he had dedicated to him in the Capitol,” at which was the way of entrance from the low level of the Forum into the raised area of the Capitol, of which some remains still stand upon the ascent of the Capitoline Hill from the Forum, in three fluted pillars with a Corinthian capital to each, and with a channelled architrave over all, forming (I believe) that very portal of the temple through which was the way of entrance into the Capitol, but supported only in their tottering state by the very ruins, that have successively accumulated from themselves around the base, even more than half way up the shaft of the pillars; “he dreamed the Jupiter of the Capitol,” on the eastern eminence of this forked hill, “complained, that his worshippers were “withdrawn from him, and himself replied he had put Jupiter Tonans “there, as a mere porter to him.” So common was a porter’s lodge at the gate of a superior house in the city of Rome during the days of Augustus; even as common as it is among ourselves at present! “Augustus,” as Suetonius adds, “in consequence of his dream, immediately hung a fringe of BELLS round the eaves of the temple,” in a taste surprisingly similar to what we see in Chinese temples at present. The similarity too is enhanced exceedingly by the use which we find made of bells, in a building of Italy prior by some ages to Augustus’s; Porsena, king of Etruria, erecting for himself near Clusium, his capital, a funeral monument, which had, upon a square base of stone, five pyramids, “so finished above,” says Pliny, from Varro, “that on the “head of each was placed an orb and cupola of brass, from which hung “bells suspended by chains, that were shaken with the wind, and (as was “formerly the case at Dodona) emitted sounds audible to a great “distance.”

“*distance.” This is in the highest style of Chinese fantasticalness. Augustus’s was in a lower degree of the same style. We thus discover what we should little expect, not merely the use of bells at Rome in the days of Augustus, at Clusium in the earlier days of Porsena, and at Dodona in the still earlier days of Græcian antiquity; but an use of them with Egyptian pyramids at Clusium, and in a temple, asserted by Herodotus to have been founded by an Egyptian, at Dodona, two incidents that seem to favour the sometimes supposed derivation of the Etrurians with the Chinese, from Egypt, and the latter an incident, which would account for “the vocal groves” at Dodona in a manner more strictly historical, than even what history itself delivers to us†.

Yet

* Pliny, xxxvi. 13: “In summo orbis æneus et petasus unus omnibus sit impositus ex quo pendent excepta eatenis tintinabula, quæ vento agitata, longè sonitus referant, ut “Dodonæ olim factum.” But, as Pliny’s account of this monument agrees very remarkably with what is called the monument of the Horatii and Curialii at the present day, let me just note the grand point of similarity; Porsena’s being “monumentum—lapide quadrato—, “supra id quadratum pyramides stant quinque,” while “the remains of five pyramids “are,” yet at the latter, “—on one large base” (Wright, 372, edit. 2d); and “this— “great mausoleum—is of coarse and rude architecture, five round broken pyramids spring “from a large square base.” (Mrs. Miller, iii. 115.) This, however, being at Albano, to the south, and that at Chiusi, to the north, precludes all possible identity between them; yet shews the present monument to be a structure like Pliny’s, about the same age, but older, and erected by some king of Latium.

† Homer, in Iliad xvi. 233-235, speaks of this temple and its priests the Selli; but Mr. Pope has made the bard speak what he never meant, and what he never knew, the oaks plainly, from his silence, becoming oracular after his time.

Whose groves the Selli, race austere, surround,
Their feet unwash’d, their slumbers on the ground.

So far Homer speaks, but it is only Mr. Pope that subjoins thus:

*Who hear from rustling oaks thy dark decrees,
And catch the fates low-whisper’d in the breeze.*

“Herodotus writes in his second book,” says Mr. Pope, “that the oracle of Dodona was “the most ancient in Greece;—but what he adds, that it was founded by an Egyptian “woman, who was the priestess of it, is contradicted by this passage of Homer, who shews “that in the time of the Trojan war this temple was served by men called Selli, and not by “women.” So much the testimony of Homer proves, but it does not “contradict” the testimony of Herodotus. The temple had women before the Trojan war, but men after it,
and

Yet how did Augustus's fringe of bells correspond with any part of his dream? He put up the bells, as Suetonius subjoins, "because BELLS
"GENERALLY HUNG AT GREAT GATES ‡." So derivatively Roman, and so very ancient is that practice, which has been ever supposed to be merely a modern refinement, and is yet introduced only into the more refined parts of our island; of having a bell at our door and at our gate! So very common too were bells then at Rome; however antiquaries have ridiculously triumphed at finding them,—seven centuries later!

Dion Cassius relates the same story, with a greater circumstantiality in the whole, yet with a variation in a single particular, that unite together in one evidence, and shew bells to have been still more common at Rome then. Having mentioned "that Augustus dedicated the "temple of Jupiter, surnamed Tonans," he goes on to relate his anecdote. "Because of the newness of its name and aspect," he cries, "and because of its erection by Augustus, but principally because those "who ascended to the Capitol came first to this temple; men generally
"repaired to it, and worshipped in it." Just so persons repair to churches on the continent, and pay private worship to God in them, those temples and these churches standing equally open through the whole day. Thus our abbey-church of Westminster stands also open, not indeed for the purposes of devotion, but for the gratification of curiosity; not a man, a woman, or a child, ever thinking of kneeling in any part of it, or offering up any private prayers in it. So much more an alien to our breasts and to our lives, is the spirit of prayer in our reformed country of Britain, than it is in the unreformed regions of the continent, or than it was among the very heathens themselves! "Augustus, and (as appears from Strabo, cited by Mr. Pope himself) sometimes both after it. But the evidence of Herodotus is too particular to be ever set aside; the priests of Egypt and the priestesses of Dodona uniting in one information to him, that the temple at the latter was ordered to be erected by a priestess from the former, even from the very town of Thebes in it.

‡ Suetonius, 91, Augustus: "Cum dedicatam in Capitolio ædem Tonanti Jovi assidue
"frequentaret, somniavit queri Capitolinum Jovem, cultores sibi abduci, seque repondisse, "Tonantem pro janitore ei appositum. Ideoque mox tintinnabulis fastigium ædis redimi"vit, quod ea ferè januis dependebant."

"therefore,

“ therefore, dreamed that the Jupiter of the great temple was angry, at being thus made second only to the other ; and that he himself answered, he had put Jupiter Tonans there, only to be a watchman before the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.” So ready was the ignorance of heathenism, and from the very consciousness of its own ignorance, to split the same god into many, to discriminate parts from parts by the mere contingency of local worship, and to set them all in open hostility against each other ! So peopled with malignity too was the very heaven of heathenism, and so spiteful were the very gods of its universe ; these the exact counterparts of the worst of men, the reflected images of the devils themselves, and turning that into a very hell ! “ And,” as Dio proceeds with his narrative concerning Augustus, “ as soon as it was day he hung BELLS round the temple, to realize his dream ; FOR those who are watchmen by night about great houses, CARRY EACH OF THEM A BELL, that *they may give an alarm to one another when they will.” So expensively were the great houses of Rome guarded by watchmen at night, and such danger were they in of being attacked by robbers ! But Dio has certainly lost the point of the allusion, as the hanging of bells round the temple bears no similarity to the bearing of a bell in a watchman’s hand ; as it evidently refers only to the hanging of bells at the gate of a great house, and under the caves of a porter’s lodge there. Yet Dio has usefully informed us by his error, that in his time at least, and (as he himself believed) in Augustus’s too, a nightly watch was kept about the houses of the great at Rome ; and that these watchmen, like those in some of our dock-yards, held each a bell in his hand, ready to give an alarm to his brethren of the watch.

* Dio, liv. 733. Τον τῆ Διὸς, τῆ Βρομίονος ἐπικαλούμενον, ναὸν καθίστασι—τῶν ἀνθρώπων, το μὲν το, πρὸς το ξένον καὶ τὸ σωματικὸς αὐτῆς καὶ τῆ τιδὸς, το δὲ καὶ, εἰ ὑπο τῆ Αὐγούστου ἰδρύσθω, μεγιστοῦδς, εἰ πρῶτοι οἱ ἀκονίτες εἰς το Καπιτώλιον ἐπιβήσαντες, προσερχομένων τε αὐτῇ καὶ σιθόντων, ἰδοῦσι τὸν Διὸς, τὸν ἐν τῇ μεγάλῃ ναῷ οὐκ, ὀργὴν ὡς καὶ τὰ δούτερα αὐτῆς φερόμενον ποιεῖσθαι, καὶ ἐκ τῆς ἐκείνῃ τε εἰπεῖν (ὡς εἰργίν), εἰ Προφυλακὰς τὸν Βρομίονα ἔχει. Καὶ, ἐπειδὴ ἡμεῖς ἐγγινώσκωμεν [κωδωνας] αὐτῇ περιττῇ βίβασιν τὴν οὐνεμίζιν. οἱ γὰρ τὰς συνουσίας νυκτὶς φυλασσόντες. κωδωνοφόρους, ὅπως σημαίνειν σφισιν ὅποσον βέλῃθωσι δύνασθαι. “ Puto legendum κωδωνας,” says an annotator ; “ penitro oculis subjiciunt veteres nummi, qui hodieque exstant, et a doctis viris sunt expressi.—Glossarium, Insula, νῆσος, συνουσία.” Notes on Suetonius, 91, Augustus.

We find even bells used in families at Rome. When they were so common at the outside of the houses, we might be very sure they were not uncommon within. But we need not leave the point to an inference, as we have positive proof of it. The Romans indeed, we see from several passages incidental but significant in their authors, roused their servants in a morning by BELLS, and ordered their servants by BELLS to bring in their meals during the day; just as commonly, as we have the breakfast, the dinner, or the supper bell among ourselves †. So grossly has the origin of bells been falsified in the conceits of our antiquaries! The Romans had them in ordinary use before they settled in Britain, and introduced them, as they introduced all their implements of use, with all their instruments of convenience or elegance, among the provinciated Britons.

Yet where shall we find that they cast their bells of a large size, raised towers for the reception of them, and so made them the deep-toned summoners to devotion in our churches? This, no doubt, must seem almost impossible to be found; as it restricts us to the purely Christian period of the Roman residence in Britain, and as we have scarcely any memorials of the period among us. Yet we see towers to churches on the continent, see them equally in every province of the Roman empire, see them at all the great churches in every province, and see them considered as ancient, even appearing as ancient, in all. We are therefore very sure, as far as analogy can give surety, that our church-towers derive not their origin, any more than our churches themselves do, or than our very Christianity does, from Alfred or from any of the Saxon sovereigns. Our church-towers came undoubtedly to the Saxons of our island, as they came to all the other nations of the empire, from that full fountain of refinement, which had been laid open by the Roman emperors, had carried its enlivening waters over all the provinces, and been peculiarly turned by Christianity into the channel of religion. The churches of the Romans in Britain must have had towers to them; and we fortunately have an account of one church which proves they had.

† “Lucianus de Mercede conductis indicat, ita familiæ signum dari solitum ad evigilandum, ἡθην τε ὑπο κωδων ἐξαντας, ἀποστεισσεμῆος τε ὑπὸν το κῶδων, συμπεριθῆς αὐτῶν καὶ καλῶ; ibidem aliquanto post, εἰ αὐτῶν ταῦτα διαλογιζόμενα, ο κωδων ηχησε, καὶ χρη των ὁμοιων ἐχισθαι καὶ περὶ ποσειν. De hōc signo, vel tubâ, quâ etiam utebantur, Seneca epistolâ xcv. ‘Transeō pistorum turbam, transeō ministratorum, per quos signo dato ad inferendam cœnam discurritur.’ Idem ‘De Brevitate Vitæ, ‘Quantâ celeritate, signo dato, glabri administeria decurrunt.’” Notes on Suetonius, 91, Augustus. Glabri! Were the Roman servants shaved like monks upon the crown of the head, and so called colloquially bald-heads? No! They were all shaved, like the servants in our royal kitchen at present. So likewise were the stage-dancers, and the stage-players. This Plautus shews in one short passage, “Glabriorem reddes mihi quam volsus ludius est.” The word “volsus,” however, shews the “baldness” to have been produced by the operation, not of the razor, but of the tweezer.

That church, which the Romans built within the city of Canterbury, afterwards became the cathedral of all England under the Saxons, and continued to exist below the Conquest. We therefore obtain a description of it. From this we find that it had a TOWER to it, that it had even TWO TOWERS. It was consequently in the very style of some of our grander cathedrals at present. One of these towers was certainly for bells, the other perhaps for symmetry alone. Yet Mr. Bentham, all unconscious of the fact, refers the erection of towers “not only for “necessary use, but often for symmetry and ornament,” to some indefinite period posterior to the tenth century. But what is still more exactly in the style of our grander cathedrals, both the towers were at the very intersection of a cross. Such a position is considered by Mr. Bentham, as the full consummation of improvement in the towers of our churches; he affirming towers to have been built for use and for ornament in his indefinite period, “particularly when the plan of a “cross was adopted.” Yet can my averment possibly be so true as I state it, and have escaped all notice before? Can the professed historian of church-building, its first form, and its subsequent improvements in this island; one too, who has an oracular consequence given him by many, because of some supposed intimations from a man of real knowledge and real genius; possibly have been so ignorant as not to know, or so inattentive as not to consider, a description sweepingly subversive of all that he says upon the subject? That my averment is true, whatever imputations its truth may throw upon Mr. Bentham, let the following translation, a literal one, of Eadmer's description of the church at the moment of its demolition, after a continuance of about seven hundred years, testify to all the world. This church, "constructed by the hands of the Romans," says Eadmer, "—had at "the MIDDLE of the LENGTH of THE VERY HALL," meaning the nave and chancel as forming one room, "TWO TOWERS, which projected beyond the ailes of the church;—one of them, that to the south, having "an altar in the middle of it," under its four supporting arches, "dedicated to the honour of pope Gregory the Blessed," so dedicated when the Saxons were converted to Christianity, "and in the side "of it that principal door of the church, which was anciently by the "English, and is even now, denominated the South Door;—but the "other tower was built on the northern side, and opposite to that, in "honour of the blessed Martin, having the cloysters in which the "monks conversed around" the projecting sides of "it." We have thus the bells, the towers, even the double towers, and the very cross itself, of our present cathedrals, all united together in this Roman church of Canterbury; and two towers fully equal in antiquity, even prior in time, to our own tower at St. German's*.

But

* Twisden, 1291, 1292. Gervase from Eadmer: "Erat—ipsa—ecclesia—Romanorum "opere facta—; sub medio longitudinis aula ipsius, duæ turres erant, prominentes ultra "ecclesia alas; quarum una, quæ in austro erat, sub honore Beati Gregorii papæ altare in "medio sui dedicatum habebat, et in latere principale hostium ecclesiæ, quod antiquitus ab "Anglis, et nunc usque, Suthdure dicitur;—alia verò turris in plagâ aquilonali, e regione "illius, condita fuit in honorem Beati Martini, claustra in quibus monachi conversabantur "hinc inde habens." That in this description "Aula" means the nave and the chancel as forming one room, the following evidence will suffice to shew. The description of Eadmer begins with, "Majori altari quod in orientali presbyterii parte parieti contiguum erat. Porro "aliud altare congruo spatio ante positum prædicto altari erat—. Ad hæc altaria nonnullis "gradibus ascendebatur a choro cantorum." Nor let us fancy this "chorus cantorum" to be that lower part of the chancel or quire, which contains the stalls of the clergy and the seats of the singers within it, and has frequently an ascent of steps from it towards the altar. No! The context expressly forbids us; the words running thus, "ascendebatur a choro "cantorum quam criptam—Romani vocant." Then the crypt he describes in general thus; "subtus erat—fabricata, cujus fornix eo in altum tendebatur, ut superiora ejus non nisi per "plures gradus possent adiri." He next describes it in particular, thus: "hæc [cripta] "intus ad orientem altare habebat," &c. "via una, quam curvatura criptæ ipsius ad

But let me notice a second church, of the same age nearly with that of Canterbury, certainly built with that by the Romans, yet existing even to the present moment. It exists indeed all unknown, lost in its remoteness from the capital of the kingdom, and buried in the unfrequented wilds of Scotland. There it still maintains a kind of lingering existence, attracting no foot of a traveller to it, engaging no pen, no pencil of a native, and just shewing itself evanescent in its ruins.

Within that detached and peninsulated part of Scotland, which forms the county of Galloway, and was occupied by the Novantes in the time of the Romans; the geographer Ptolemy, about the year 140, mentions a town, which he calls *LUCOPIBIA, and which has naturally been supposed to be Whitern there, a town known to have been formerly considerable, though much reduced at present. Whitern indeed appears to have actually been, what Lucopibia equally was, the “occidentem vergentem concipiebat, usque ad locum quietis Beati Dunstani tendebatur,” who was buried “ante ipsos gradus.” And he finally traces it all under the chancel and the nave, thus: “inde ad occidentem chorus psallentium in aulam ecclesiæ porrigebatur, decenti fabricâ,” by its underground position, its flight of steps, and its door, “a frequentiâ turbæ seclusus.” Having thus described the undercroft from east to west, Eadmer returns up stairs into the chancel. “Deinde sub medio longitudinis aulæ ipsius,” &c. But he closes all with this account: “Finis ecclesiæ ornabatur oratorio Beatæ Matris Dei Mariæ; ad quod, quia structura ejus talis erat,” the chancel being on the same level with the nave, and the ascent being only to a chapel, “non nisi per gradus cujusvis patebat accessus.” This Roman church, therefore, differed considerably in its interior disposition from its successor, the present church; its chancel floor not being raised upon arches, and ascended by steps, above and from the level of the nave, to admit an undercroft exclusively below it; but its nave running on a level with its chancel, and both having one common undercroft below them. Yet Gostling, 89, Somner, 92, 93, and Battely, 7, all overlook this striking difference, and represent the old church as vaulted exactly like the new. Battely also turns the undercroft into the nave, because it is denominated the “chorus psallentium;” as if a nave could be a quire or a quire a nave, as if the “chorus psallentium” was not the same with the “chorus cantorum” before, and as if the “chorus cantorum” was not expressly denominated the “cripta.” And Mr. Denne, in Arch. x. 42, has made the quire indeed distinct from the crypt, but carries the crypt under the quire only; as in xi. 378, 379, he unites with Battely to contradict himself, by confounding the crypt and the quire together.

* Ptolemy, ii. 3.

capital of the Novantes in the days of the Romans. Richard of Cirencester, that lately discovered and very happy illustrator of our Britain during the settlement of the Romans within it, whom I may claim the honour of placing in his merited pre-eminence of authority over our antiquaries, writing thus, “the metropolis of the Novantes is Lucophibia, alias Whitern*.” At this Lucophibia, or Lucopibia, as the capital of the kingdom, was fixed the seat of a bishopric; when Christianity came with her wand of power, transformed the idolatrous fools of the earth into worshippers of the only God, and modelled realms into sees for their spiritual emolument. This was about the close of the fourth century†. And Nynian, a native of Britain, but educated at Rome, became the first prelate of it‡. He was born undoubtedly in the southern parts of the isle, which, in the progress of Christianity from Gaule, were converted before the northern; had there been converted, sent to Rome for his full instruction in the new religion, and at Rome ordained a clergyman of it. Then that holy fire of zeal, which burned within his bosom, pushed him upon an apostolic journey into the unconverted regions of the north. He came into Galloway, as tradition happily unites with history to tell us, and began his work of love among the heathen Novantes, in the neighbourhood of their capital. “He was the first,” as Malmesbury reports expressly, “who preached the Gospel of Christ to them§.” In this work he seems to have encountered all that opposition, which the very apostles themselves, armed as they were with powers of a miraculous nature, and carrying either life or death in the words of their tongues, we know to have equally encountered. Tradition, which dwells upon his name with fondness to the present moment, points at a cave a few miles from Whitern, a dark and dismal hollow, scooped out by the hand of nature, guarded by the sea at its entrance, and denominated St. Nynian’s Cave by the people; reporting it to be his place of refuge from the fury of persecution.

* Richard, 29: “Metropolis horum [Novantum] Lucophibia, alias Casæ Candidæ.”

† Bede, iii. 4.

‡ Ibid. ibid. “De natione Brittonum, qui erat Romæ regulariter fidem et mysteria veritatis edoctus.”

§ Malmesbury, 155: “Primus ibidem Christi prædicationem evangelizavit.”

The dismalness and darkness of this hollow, therefore, were then relieved to the apostolic saint, we may be sure, by the happiness which he felt in his soul from his ministerial labours, from the solid, the permanent, the everlasting good which he was endeavouring to do for the people, and from the very persecutions which he was sustaining for so acting. It has often re-echoed probably to the voice of prayer and praise from this illustrious confessor, while the scream of the sea-gull near the mouth, and the dashing of the waves at a little distance from it, precluded all danger of disclosure by the sounds. But the apostles triumphed at last, over a world contending strenuously for its own wretchedness; and our British apostle prevailed finally, in converting the Druidical heathens of Galloway. A church now stands upon the sea-shore, much nearer than the cave to Whiteru, and only three miles from it; which marks the first step of his triumphant advance towards the capital. It is very small, but built of stone, now lying most confusedly in ruins, yet averred by tradition to have been the first oratory that was erected for our religion within the present Scotland. Here then St. Nynian fixed his standard at first, and hence he moved with it over all the region. All the Novantes became Christians, the residence of the king was appointed the equal residence of a prelate, and the converter of the nation was ordained the bishop of it. He therefore erected a cathedral for himself at Whiteru*; that very cathedral which is now the object of our inquiry. Yet, when he had done this, he was urged by the heavenly impulse, which had brought him into Galloway, and carried him in a course of victories through it; to engage in a new mission, and to attempt a new scene of success. This kind of impulse appears very strange to the philosophy of modern times; and is very strange to all certainly, in whom philosophy has laid its icy hand on the heart, and benumbed all the livelier activities of religion within it. Yet . Spirits are not finely touch'd,

But to fine issues.

And a Nynian was one of those finer spirits, that could not bear to think of a large portion of his countrymen lying buried in the vicious

* Bede, iii. 4: "Cujus sedem episcopalem,—ecclesiâ insignem, &c."

ignorance

ignorance of heathenism, while the sun of Christianity was at once enlightening and warming the rest of them. He therefore left his episcopal charge awhile, in order to carry that sun with him to the north, happily as he had brought it already to the south, of the Roman province between the walls. A mission for the conversion of heathens within our own island sounds awfully curious to our minds at present, because we are accustomed only to think or talk of missions into such distant countries as Africa, America, or the East Indies. He set out from Whitern for the north; but by this time all the province of Valentia had been converted, and there was no scope for his labours short of the farther wall. He therefore passed the wall, ventured among the Caledonians beyond it, but kept to the tribes along the eastern coast; and gloriously consummated his progress of preaching there, by the conversion of all between the sea and the mountains§. Thus did his zeal spire up victorious in a second flame of fire, and ascend in a still nearer approach to its kindred fires of heaven: this being done, he returned to Whitern, closed a life of exemplary greatness, and was buried in his own cathedral ||.

From this cathedral did the capital assume a new name, even its present one of WHITERN. Camden indeed had formerly conjectured its name of Lucopibia in Ptolemy, to be merely a vicious reading in the Greek of that author, for Λευκὸ Ὀκιδία, the original reading, and answering exactly to Whitern in signification*. This conjecture carried such a fair face of probability with it, that the human mind, which loves to rest upon certainties, and is always gravitating to them as its natural centre, adopted the conjecture implicitly in our antiquaries; even Richard of Cirencester seemed to come in lately, and establish the conjecture for ever: “the metropolis of the Novantes” he calling “Lucophibia, alias § Bede, iii. 4: “Austres Picti—multo ante tempore, ut perhibent, relicto errore idolatriæ, fidem veritatis acceperant, prædicante eis verbum Nyniâ, episcopo reverentissimo et sanctissimo viro.”

|| Ibid. ibid.: “Ubi ipse etiam corpore—requiescit.”

* Camden, 692, 693.

“Casæ Candidæ†.” Yet the conjecture is demonstrably false, and even Richard concurs to prove it so: the appellation of Whitern in Saxon, or of Casa Candida in Latin, is derived solely and purely from this cathedral; Bede assuring us expressly, that “the place is popularly called Ad Candidam Casam,” or Whitern, “because Nynian built there a church‡.” Ptolemy therefore could know no more of the name than he knew of the cathedral occasioning it; while Richard’s repetition of the name in Latin, with only the variation of a single letter in it, proves it to have been an appellation unvitiated in itself, and British in its origin: this was superseded so early as the Roman times by a title descriptive of the cathedral, the town being then denominated “Ad Candidam Casam” by the Romans, and from them by the Saxons afterward “At Whitern.” Yet how came the cathedral to attract such a denomination to itself, and then to extend it over the town? Bede tells us that it was occasioned by “Nynian’s construction of the church with stone, in a mode unusual among the Britons§.” Yet that churches were constructed with stone before, is evident from the churches of St. Saviour and St. Martin in the south, and from the oratory of Nynian himself in the north. For the former half of this reason, perhaps, the historian Malmesbury restricts the observation of Bede to the Britons of Galloway alone, and places the unusualness of the building, not in the stone itself, but in the polish given it||. And Major, the Scottish historian, varies equally from Malmesbury as from Bede, but comes much nearer to a rational account of the name, by building Nynian’s church of stones, unusual to the Britons, *because white. But the fact is, that the stones of the cathedral in the ruins of it, in the church erected at a small distance from it, and in the houses of the town constructed much out of the palace and the priory, the latter yet remaining in part, but the former so torn up from the very foundations as to have corn growing upon the site, appear to be principally of the sort called the common whin, and occasionally of the

† Richard, 29: “Metropolis horum Lucophibia, aliàs Cæsæ Candidæ.”

‡ Bede, iii. 4: “Vulgò vocatur Ad Candidam Casam, cò quòd ibi ecclesiam—fecerit.”

§ Ibid. ibid: “Ecclesiam de lapide, insolito Britonibus more, fecerit.”

|| Malmesbury, f. 155: “Ecclesiam ibi lapide polito, Brittonibus miraculum, fecerit.”

* Major, f. xxiii.: “Ecclesiam de albis lapidibus Britonibus insolitam.”

free, the free partly white but partly red, the whin neither naturally white nor made white by polishing, and both supposed at Whitern to have been brought from the adjoining region of Cumberland. So egregiously does every hypothesis fail us in accounting for the name! Nor should I have been able to account for it any better than my predecessors in this walk of history, if a custom still retained at Whitern had not suggested an idea, if I did not see the passage in Bede very capable of admitting this argumentatively just, and if I had not found this alone to be capable of giving an import to the passage historically just. Some of the inhabitants in the town coat over their houses without, in a manner well known among ourselves at present, by mixing up coarse sand with lime, and dashing it upon their walls. This rough-cast, as it is denominated, is particularly used in Cornwall, for the same reason probably that causes it to be used at Whitern, as a preservative against the damp atmosphere of both regions, so sure to be imbibed by wall stones undefended, and throws a pleasing aspect of whiteness also over the appearance of a house. But the practice appears from Bede to have been uncommon among the Britons of Galloway, of the north, and of the south, at the time; as he says the town was called Whitern, “because Nynian built a church at it of stone, in a manner unusual to the Britons” at large. Nynian brought the practice probably from Rome itself; first tried it in a coat upon the priory-house of his cathedral, and so attached an appellation of whiteness to it, to the church of which it was the mansion annexed, and to the town as it stood in a proximity with both. Nynian’s priory-house is mentioned expressly with Nynian’s cathedral by a very early chronicle; this as “his church,” but that as “his *myuster;” both, therefore, as built by Nynian himself; and a mynster or priory-house is so uniform an appendage to a larger church, that this very chronicle, in its very commencements, speaks of such a church expressly as a monastery or mynster†, and we still give the appellation of mynster or monastery to many a large church among us. Thus was the priory-house of our large churches the regular denominator of the whole; and it was very particularly so at Whiterne, the priory-part being the only one capable of being denominated a Casa, an Ern, or a small habitation.

* Saxon Chronicle, p. 21.

† A. D. 659: “Wynjeter on to Wynbjanne.” Sax. Chron.

This cathedral continued to the days of Bede, three hundred years after the burial of Nynian within it. Nynian, he tells us, “built a church in which he himself rests †.”—“The South-Picts,” adds the Saxon Chronicle, “were baptized by bishop Ninna,—his church and “his mynster is at Whiterne,—where he reſteib §.” Nor was it destroyed so late as the days of Malmesbury, he speaking of “Whiterne” as “a place in which the blessed confessor Nima rests—; the name is “derived to the place from the work of Nima in erecting a church “there,” not yet destroyed, as it is plain from his silence, and yet containing the body of its builder ||. Malmesbury even recites the names of some of its prelates, the successors of Nynian in his see; Pectelm, who was bishop when Bede concluded his history ¶, Frethewald, Pecwine, Ethelbrith, and Bealdulf*. “Nor do I find any more,” he cries, “because the episcopate speedily failed ††;” and so makes a gross mistake in point of fact, Florence adding Heathored to all, and Fordun even marking the continuance of the see to 1235 ‡‡. In the days of Bede the bishopric of Whiterne had been raised into an archbishopric, though Malmesbury has overlooked the incident, and Pectelm sat the first archbishop in the throne of Nynian §§. But the town began to decline, and the throne was sure to be removed. Tradition says, with its usual and almost unavoidable confusedness of chronology, that in ancient times the trade from England and France, to Ayre and Glasgow,

† Bede, iii. 4: Ubi ipse etiam corpore—requiescit,—ibi ecclesiam fecerit.”

§ Sax. Chron. p. 21.

|| Malmesbury, f. 155: “Candida Casa vocatur locus—, ubi beatus confessor Nima requiescit;—nomen loco ex opere inditum, quòd ecclesiam ibi—fecerit.”

¶ Bede, v. 33. But Malmesbury forgets that Bede hints at other bishops in iii. 4, saying that Nynian rests at Whiterne, “eum pluribus sanctis.”

* Malmesbury, 155.

†† Ibid. ibid.: “Nec præterea plures alicubi reperio, quòd citò defceerit episcopatus.”

‡‡ Florentius, 565; and Fordun, i. 520-523; ii. 61.

§§ Bede, v. 33.

was carried on through this part of the country, and Whiterne made the depository of it. But, as the very strong tides of the Mull of Galloway ceased to be formidable, navigation probably ventured round the Mull with its freight, and the goods were carried to those towns by water: Whiterne thus sunk in its consequence, and the archiepiscopate was transferred to Glasgow. Yet the cathedral building still continued at Whiterne very nearly to the Reformation; Major speaking of it exactly as Bede speaks, saying in the sixteenth century as Bede says in the eighth, “Nynian constructed a church, in which Nynian himself rests; “which place was then possessed by the Britons,” meaning the Saxons in the days of Bede; “but now, for many years past, the place and the “body of the saint have been owned by the Scots ¶.” It actually continued to the very Reformation; Leland speaking of it as “a handsome “church, built of squared stones, and taking the appellation of Whiterne, “which is even now the temple of Ninian, the capital city of Gallo“way ¶.”

This cathedral, however, appears not to have weathered that storm of rapacity which was engendered by the Reformation every where, and which blew with double violence in Scotland; then the cold and sullen genius of presbyterianism being averse to the dignity, and dead to the sanctity of a church built by a saint, a confessor, an apostle, a new church was erected only about eighty feet in length, with thirty in width, even standing north and south, carrying a ball for a cross at each end above, and having neither tower nor bell to it.

“Still so perverse and opposite,

“As if they worshipp’d God in spite!”

The cathedral was thus left in all the dignity of despised grandeur, like the ruins of Rome amid the pigmy sons of the world’s conquerors, or like the elegant magnificence of Palmyra to the Arab pitching his tent for the night beneath it; to suffer the devastations of time, to be shaken with the howling winds, and to be buffeted by the driving rains. It is traditionally said, however, to have been four times as large as the new church; that is, as far as such vague and general mensurations can ascertain length or breadth, 320 feet long, with 120 broad, or about one seventh short of Exeter cathedral at present*. Yet a few rude vaults, in one of which I suppose St. Nynian to have been buried, though his tomb has perished with his church; some coarse walls at a little distance, but both (I presume from their coarseness and rudeness) the very relics of the original church, and eight arches out of the whole of the original number, now compose the remains of this venerable cathedral. Some of the remaining arches are round, and some peaked; the round appearing to be what “the Norman ambition of building,” I apprehend, reconstructed just after the Conquest, because they have much work upon them; a ram’s head (a signature, I suppose, of the building bishop) at the top of one of them, and other ornaments of wreathings, all in a good state of preservation; but the peaked, as ancient, very plain. And as the whole is found experimentally to have been cemented with the lime of those shells with which the fields around are inexhaustibly replenished, so is it known by report from the fathers of the present generation, to have been as late as their time built in THE VERY FORM OF A CROSS, with a bell-tower assuredly at the intersection of it †.

¶ Major, f. xxxiii.: “Ecclesiam—construxit, ubi ipse Ninianus,” &c. “quem locum “Britones tunc occupabant,—sed jam a multis annis—locum et sanctum corpus Scoti “habent.”

¶ De Script. Brit. 57: “Bella ecclesia, ex quadratis constructa saxis, Candidæ Casæ “nomen recepit; quod et nunc fanum Niniani, urbs Gallovidiæ prima.”

Yet there is one instance more to be noticed by me, one which is not buried in its own remoteness, and lost in its own solitariness of position, but overlooked from its very familiarity, unseen from its very brightness, and therefore sure to appear still more astonishing to my reader. We have yet a church of the Britons existing almost entire near London,

* Willis’s Not. Parl. ii. 261.

† For the local particulars I am indebted to the obliging kindness of Dr. J. Davidson, the minister of Whitem; a kindness that would have been more obliging still, if he had answered my second letter as punctually as he answered my first, and as readily replied to the questions which he invited as to those which I obtruded upon him, existing unrecognised by our antiquaries, even by its very historian, yet shewing a British bell-tower and a British cross at the present moment. This is the abbey-church of SAINT ALBAN'S, of which we have lately had an historian in a clergyman of a keen eye, an active understanding, and a lively judgment; yet the real history of which, as to the date of its component parts, is utterly unknown to the public still. The owl, that legitimate and authorized type of learning in general, but from its fondness for moping in darkness, for screaming from the ruined tower, or for fluttering about the ivy-mantled temple, the peculiarly apposite type of antiquarian literature in particular, is even more confounded by the effulgence of noon-day about her than by the gloom of midnight.

That in ten or twelve years after the martyrdom of St. Alban, a church was erected upon the present ground in honour of his memory, appears evident from Bede and Gildas together*. This church continued to the days of Gildas, as he tells us in his lamentation over the success of the Saxons, that "the place of sepulture for the bodies of the "holy martyrs, and the scenes of their sufferings;" meaning, however, the scene and place only of St. Alban's sufferings and sepulture, as is evident from the only martyrs that he has noticed, Alban of Verulam, Aaron and Julius of Caerleon, "if they had not been taken from our "countrymen in a mournful divorce made by the barbarians, would "have impressed upon the minds of beholders no small ardour of divine "love†." The church of St. Alban, therefore, was not destroyed by the invading Saxons, as the credulity of antiquarianism has hitherto believed; but, as the language of Gildas proves, was only taken from the Britons. Nor was it destroyed by the Saxons after their settlement, in any paroxysm of zeal for heathenism: they who spared the churches of St. Martin and St. Saviour at Canterbury, were not likely to destroy

* Bede, i. 7: "Redeunte temporum Christianorum serenitate ecclesia est—exstructa;" and Gildas Hist. viii. "Bilustro supradicti turbinis needum ad integrum adimpleto,—basilicæ sanctorum martyrum fundant, construunt, perficiunt."

† Gildas Hist. viii.: "Sanctorum martyrum—corporum sepulturæ et passionum loca, si "non lugubri divortione barbarorum—civibus adimerentur, non minimum intuitum mentibus ardorem divinæ charitatis incuterent."

a church at St. Alban's. This church actually survived the heathenism, as well as the hostility, of the Saxons; became a celebrated church among them, upon their conversion to Christianity; and still bore its original name from the protomartyr of Britain. The fact appears so late as the eighth century of our æra, and the days of Bede; because that historian gives us a particular account of St. Alban's martyrdom, and speaks of his church as then existing, as "a church of wonderful workmanship, and worthy of such a martyr*." This church, consequently, lasted to the days of Offa's visit to Verulam in 790, only fifty-five years after the death of Bede. Accordingly we see M. Paris, the private historian of the abbey, though under a gross delusion of belief that the Saxons had demolished the church before †; yet finding then on the site "a certain church, small in its size, constructed there without the walls of Verulam, in honour of the blessed martyr, and constructed by THE NEW CONVERTS TO CHRISTIANITY ‡." In this church was the raised body of St. Alban now placed for the first time, and paintings, tapestries, with other ornaments, were hung upon the walls to decorate them §: M. Paris, indeed, avers this church to have been so decorated with ornaments, and so honoured with the body, only till a larger could be built ||. Yet, as his own account proves it to have been built by "the new converts to Christianity," so Bede's brief description

* Bede, i. 7: Ecclesia est mirandi operis, atque ejus martyrio condigna, exstructa." It seems a very wonderful want of attention and thinking, that Mr. Newcome, the recent historian of this abbey, who, in p. 24, refers expressly to Bede for "a church—early erected here," to St. Alban, "with admirable art, though of timber and plank," which Bede does not aver, we see, and his very notice of "admirable art," by implication denies; yet never refers to Bede for the existence of it in the days of Bede, and even intimates that it had been demolished long before. But Bede evidently speaks from vision, mediate or immediate, concerning the church; and proves he does so speak, by these words directly following: "in quo videlicet loco," at the tomb of St. Alban, "usque in hanc diem, curatio infirmorum et frequentium operatio virtutum celebrari non desinit."

† M. Paris, 983.

‡ M. Paris, 984: "Quandam ecclesiolam, ibidem extra urbem Verolanium a neophytis in honorem beati martyris constructam."

§ M. Paris, 984.

|| M. Paris, 984.

of the same church proves it not to have been what Paris presumes to call it, “a church small in its size,” but what the decorations given by Offa argue it to have been, “a church of wonderful workmanship, and “worthy of such a martyr.” Nor does even Paris mention any other church to have been built by Offa for his monastery, or to have been erected by Offa over the saint’s remains; he mentions only, that “from “houses of most regular religiousness did Offa assemble a convent of “monks to the tomb,” and “appoint an abbot over them*.” He mentions only that Offa, “at his own expense, constructed all the “buildings except an old edifice which he found erected formerly out of “the ancient edifices of the heathens †; which was plainly as “an old “edifice,” this very church of the Romans, now nearly five hundred years old, which was only supposed to have been “erected formerly “out of the ancient edifices of the heathens,” because it was composed of the same sort of materials as they; and which, if so erected by the Saxons, could not possibly have been “formerly” erected, or be “an “old edifice” now, the Saxons of Middlesex and Hertfordshire being even converted to the Gospel merely about one hundred and thirty years before ‡. And he mentions only that Offa “in his monastery “which he had begun from the foundations, within four or five years “after he began the pious work, had in a style of excellence erected “nearly all the officinal buildings §;” all the buildings officinal to that, which was the principal and denominator of the whole—the church ||. Nor does Paris note any other church to have been built for the relics or

* M. Paris, 986: “Monachorum—conventum ex domibus ordinate [ordinatæ] religionis—ad tumbam congregavit, et abbatem eis,” &c.

† M. Paris, 986: “Ædificia omnia præterquam pristinum, quod invenit de veteribus “ædificiis paganorum pridem factum, sumptibus propriis construxit.” Mr. Newcome has totally overlooked this remarkable fact.

‡ Bede, iii. 30.

§ M. Paris, 987: “Fere omnia officinalia ædificia laudabiliter in cœnobio suo, quod a “fundamentis inchoaverat, ædificaverat infra quartum quintumve annum postquam pium “opus illud inchoaverat.” Mr. Newcome overlooks the language here, as he had overlooked the fact before, though he actually translates the language into “all the offices and necessary “buildings,” p. 29.

|| So ecclesia is used for the whole monastery in M. Paris, 986, &c. &c.

for the convent, by any of the Saxon abbots afterward. Yet he shews us Ulsin or Ulsig, the sixth abbot, encouraging a town that had now begun to rise on the outside of the monastery, by inviting persons to settle in it, by laying out a market-place for them, by assisting them with money or materials for the erection of houses, and even building no less than three churches for them*. But what proves Offa to have constructed no new church for his abbey, Aldred the eighth abbot appears only one hundred and fifty years after Offa searching into the ruins of Verulam, “laying up those materials which he found fit for an “edifice, and reserving them for the fabric of the church; as he had “determined, if he could be furnished with the means, to tear down “the ancient church, and to build it anew†.” But, “when he had “collected a great quantity of materials for the fabric of the church, he “was prevented by an over-early death, and obliged to leave the work “undone‡.” His immediate successor, Eadmer, “did not disperse or “consume what Aldred had collected for the construction of the church;” even searched for more in the ruins of Verulam, and “reserved all that “were necessary for the fabrication of that church, which he proposed “to fabricate to the holy martyr Alban;” yet “did not so far please God “and the martyr, as to erect and finish a house for the martyr him-self§.” After him the intention was never revived by any of the Saxons, and even the very search for materials was discontinued by them all: yet the intention was never abandoned, as the materials in general remained entire to the Conquest, and the application of them was then begun ||.

Thus

* M. Paris, 993.

† M. Paris, 994: “Quos invenit aptus [aptos] ad ædificia seponens, ad fabricam ecclesiæ reservavit; proposuit enim, si facultates suppeterent, dirutâ veteri ecclesiâ novam construere.”

‡ M. Paris, 994: “Cum jam multam—ad fabricam ecclesiæ coacervâset quantitatem, maturâ nimis morte præventus, imperfecto negotio, viam universæ carnis est ingressus.”

§ M. Paris, 994: “Adquisita—ad ecclesiam construendam, non dispersit vel consumpsit;” 995, “quæ ecclesiæ fabricandæ fuerunt necessaria, sibi reservaret, quam proposuit sancto martyri fabricare;” 994, “non in tantum placuit Deo ac martyri, ut domum ipsius martyris ædificaret et consummaret.”

|| These remarkable incidents in the history of St. Alban’s church, so hostile and ruinous

Thus we have deduced the church of the Britons down to the æra of the Conquest; when Paul, a Norman, became abbot, brought with him all the Norman spirit of building, and began the long-intended renovation of the church. "He re-edified," says Paris, "this church and "the other buildings, except the bakehouse and millhouse, out of the "materials collected and reserved by his predecessors*." The recent historian accordingly tells us, that Paul, who became abbot in 1077, to Mr. Newcome's notions, are recorded faithfully by Mr. Newcome, in p. 34, 35. But then he has deprived them of all power of hurting him, by what I must call a little of the craft of authorship, at the very beginning. The words in M. Paris, 993, are uncommonly forcible, as the abbot's intention is declared to have been, "dirutâ veteri ecclesiâ," to pull down the ancient church, the church which had now lasted about six centuries and a half, which might therefore with strict propriety be called ancient. Yet how does Mr. Newcome deal with a language, so pointedly contrary to his opinions? He rebutates its point, by this too cunning kind of version; the abbot being said by him to have "determined to pull down "the present fabric, which had served for a church." (P. 34.) Mr. Newcome will not call it a church, though M. Paris calls it such; says even in contradiction direct to Paris, that it had only "served for a church;" and, because it could not be ancient if built by Offa, while Mr. Newcome believes it to have been so built, suppresses entirely all Paris's mention of its antiquity. Such is history in the hands of hypothesis; a torch endeavouring to enlighten the stone-blind, a sun attempting to melt the polar ice!

* M. Paris, 995, says, that Leofric the tenth abbot sold "thesaurum ad fabricam ecclesiæ diu antè reservatum, cum columnis, tabulatibus, in terrâ (ut dictum est) inventis, cum materiæ [materiâ] etiam," or with the timber. Yet all so sold could not be much to the whole, as in 1001 we find that "iste [Paulus] hanc ecclesiam, cæteraque ædificia præter pistorium et pinsinoehium, re-ædificavit ex—materie—quam invenit a prædecessoribus suis collectam et reservatam." But Mr. Newcome adopts both, however contradictory, and even inflames the contradiction between them; consistent only in following his author through all contradictions very faithfully. In p. 36, he says, Leofric "sold the materials which had been gathered, with all the columns or pillars, and stone-pavements preserved out of the old city." Yet in p. 45, &c. unconscious seemingly of his own tergiversation, he furnishes Paul with materials for rebuilding the church from what had been thus gathered. The "stone-pavements" too, which he finds in Paris's "tabulatibus" above, answering to the "antiquos tabulatus lapideos" of abbot Eadmer, he himself found, in p. 35 before, to be very truly "slabs of stone," as being equally "cum tegulis et columnis," said there by Paris to be "ecclesiæ fabricandæ necessaria." And "the materials which had been gathered" in Mr. Newcome, are merely "the money which had been reserved" in Paris, "thesaurum ad fabricam ecclesiæ diu antè reservatum, cum columnis, tabulatibus," and "cum materiâ."

"within

“ within the first eleven years of his government rebuilt the church †.” Mr. Newcome thus speaks a language as comprehensive as Paris’s, and exhibits Paul for the rebuilder of the whole. Yet he instantly contracts his own language with Paris’s, and attributes only a part to Paul. “ When it is said by my author M. Paris,” he cries, “ that Paul rebuilt “ the church ; this must be understood only of so much of the present “ building, as comprehends ‡” what is in truth and fact no part of Paul’s building. What part then did Paul construct ? This is pointed out to us by such decisive signatures, that we can only wonder in amazement at Mr. Newcome’s missing them. “ Just below the screen,” he informs us himself, as he goes from east to west, beyond the screen, about the middle of it, “ on the south side, are four or five arches and piers of the “ most beautiful style in the whole building §.” These therefore answer very exactly to that “ Norman ambition” of building, concerning which we have heard so much before. But we have another signature, still more decisive. “ As a mark of the antiquity of the—beautiful part,” he adds himself, without perceiving the force of his own evidence, “ there “ may be seen at the spring of the arches the head of LANFRANC, of Offa “ and his queen, and of Edward the Confessor ; and over their heads are “ the arms of England,” &c. ; “ all cut in the Totternhoe stone, and “ very entire at this day ||.” The head of Lanfranc appropriates this “ beautiful part” of the whole to Paul, because Paul was a near relation to Lanfranc, even so near (according to the surmise of some about a century afterwards) as to be his son, and certainly beloved by him with all the affection of a father for a son ; Paul being brought into England by Lanfranc, from his own abbey of Caen, made abbot of St. Alban’s by the interest of Lanfranc, and supplied by Lanfranc with great sums of money for this reconstruction ¶. Here, therefore, “ just below the “ screen,” we are certain of the hand of Paul. But can we trace his hand any farther ? We can, by the guidance of Mr. Newcome, yet in contradiction to his purpose. “ From the screen before mentioned to the “ great west door,” as we are told by him, “ we see how the work did “ improve,” and in that as well as in the part immediately preceding

† P. 45.

‡ P. 45.

§ P. 94.

|| P. 94.

¶ M. Paris, 1001.

here,

here, behold “all the several specimens of good and complete building.— “ Indeed, so complete and perfect is the style of these beautiful parts, “ that the authors may be thought to have reached the summit of their “ art: for it is not only calculated for strength and duration, but the “ proportion of the several parts of the arch and its columns is most ex“ quisite, and contrived with so much judgment, that they lose nothing “ of their beauty, though placed more than forty feet above the eye of “ the observer. These specimens of the perfect Gothic are equal, in “ themselves, to any work in any cathedral; but yet, as they consist only “ of four or five arches in each specimen, they appear not with that “ commanding admiration [admirableness], which results from a whole “ and complete building erected in this style*.” These fine parts all unite to attest the fine architecture of the Norman Paul. Yet how the architecture of Paul comes thus to be broken into parts, into “several specimens,” with “four or five arches in each specimen;” Mr. Newcome never thinks of informing us, and we must therefore inform ourselves.
 The first specimen is “the beautiful part” of four pillars, that exhibits the head of Lanfranc upon the spring of one of its arches; and with this, therefore, as we may be sure, Paul began. He then pursued the work towards the western door, leaving (as Mr. Newcome’s language implies, and his ground-plan shews) one pillar of the ancient church, different in shape and size from the others before; and beyond it forming a second specimen of four pillars, exactly the same as his preceding, but ranging up to the door itself†. Leaving the door in its ancient state, as I shall soon shew, he went on again upon the northern side, moved eastward, and formed a third specimen of three pillars‡. Here then we have the whole of what was built by Paul; as the head of Lanfranc at the beginning, the beauty of the whole, with the separation into parts, the dissimilarity of these pillars from the others, and those attestations of history or remains, which I shall now produce, all unite to evince. Abbot Warren dying in 1195, after a government of near twelve years, John, his successor, “undertook the repair or rebuilding of the west front of the church,” says Mr. Newcome; and then

* P. 46, 94, and 95.

† See the ground-plan at p. 306.

‡ Ground-plan, p. 306.

puzzles himself, as he well may, to account for this front being "ruinated" so soon after he supposes Paul to have rebuilt it §. But the ruined state of it in so short a time, proves at once that Paul had not rebuilt it. Nor was this a mere repair, but a total reconstruction; made too, not by Paul, but by John, a hundred years afterward. Accordingly Paris acquaints us, that John "tore down to the ground the "wall of the front of our church ||;" the western end being in full propriety denominated the front, because there, as at our own St. German's, was the grand doorway into the church, and the building was entered, as all long buildings should be, at the lower end. Nor was this front completed again till many years afterward ¶. This front then formed a second interruption, in Paul's fabrication of the church; and, after the next three pillars of the north, came an absolute conclusion to it. For after them appear in the ground-plan six pillars ranging up to the screen, the same in size and form with the one at the western end of "the beautiful part," first mentioned, and answering to that as well as to the "four—piers" of this part. "Directly opposite "to these" piers, says Mr. Newcome himself, are "on the north side "five" arches but six piers "of the most rude and ordinary" style*. These, therefore, like the one pillar, still existing on the south, and, like the western front, existing for nearly one hundred years after Paul's erection, are parts of the ancient church of the Britons, all left standing at the time of Paul's erection, and so remaining all except that front to this day. The rest are three sets of pillars, four, four, and three, that "consist only of four or five arches in each specimen," yet are all together "specimens of the perfect Gothic," forming "several specimens of good and complete building," being even "equal in themselves to any work in any cathedral," in which "the authors may be "thought to have reached the summit of their art †."

Thus

§ P. 92, 93.

|| M. Paris, 1047: "Murum frontis ecclesiæ nostræ in terram diruit."

¶ Ibid. 1054, as printed, but 1062 in reality, "Opus frontale," &c.

* P. 94.

† Mr. Newcome, p. 45, asserts that Paul, "within the first eleven years of his government, rebuilt the church and all the adjacent buildings of the monastery, except the "bakehouse

Thus far we have accounted for all that half of the church, which is to the west of the screen! Nor have we yet reached the object and aim of our investigation. We shall soon reach it, however. The same sort of pillars continues upon each side to the altar ‡; as we have seen six on the northern and one upon the southern, before. All this half too being “so much—as comprehends the choir—, the tower—, and the “east end called the saint’s chapel, where stood afterward the shrine “of Alban, with the TRANSEPT north and south, and part of the nave, “as far only as the screen;—all—is of one uniform style, and in the “plainest and rudest form of the Gothic §.” This therefore agrees completely in style with the six piers immediately on the north, described before as “of the most rude and ordinary” style. And both combine with the one upon the south, to prove all of them the grand remains of that ancient church, which was built by the Britons, which exists only in a single pier on the south of the nave, west of the screen, but shews no less than six piers on the north, even exists complete in the nave east of the screen, in the transept, and in the quire *.

Nor

“bakehouse and millhouse.” He thus does wrong unintentionally to M. Paris, who says merely of Paul, that “iste hanc ecclesiam cæteraque ædificia,” absolutely all whether adjacent or not adjacent, “præter pistorium et pinsinochium, re-ædificavit.” But that M. Paris does not mean all which even his words import, is plain from two succeeding passages; in one of which he repeats, that Paul constructed “ecclesiam—cum multis aliis ædificiis” (p. 1002); while in the other he declares, that Lanfranc died when Paul had been abbot about twelve years; but Lanfranc’s successor, Anselm, assisted Paul in finishing the church, “quod imperfectum erat in ædificiis ecclesiæ Sancti Albani juvit—consummare,” and that Paul, in the four remaining years of his life, completed all which he had begun, “omnia quæ incæpit laudabiliter consummavit.” (P. 1004.) This second operation of Paul’s is precluded by Mr. Newcome above. Yet in the very next page he admits it, as he hints at a part of the building being raised “in the later years of Paul.”

‡ Ground-plan.

§ P. 45.

* Mr. Newcome, p. 46, asserts a part of the church, west of the screen, to have been built in the later years of Paul, or the “beginning of” his immediate successor “Richard’s “time,” while all is attributed to Paul alone, as we have seen in a note before, by M. Paris himself. Yet, in p. 53 and 93, Mr. Newcome adds, that “abbot Richard—built “the screen,” and a chapel near it; when Paris, who mentions the chapel, says not a syllable concerning the screen (p. 1006); when indeed Paris says, p. 1002, that Paul built

Nor can any allegation from Mr. Newcome, as if these speaking varieties of architecture were produced by the difference of the materials used, have the weight of a feather in the scale. "One principal cause " of the plain and rude style of Paul's building," he cries concerning the eastern half of the church, and so mounts into the air instead of mining in the ground for his diamonds, "was this; that his materials, namely, " the Roman tile, would not admit of so many shapes and forms, " and elegant curve lines, as stone would, being too hard to be cut," when stone was not †!!! So readily can the disquisitive mind ascribe an incompetent cause, even to an imaginary principle, what every thinking one must refer to a difference of times; attribute equally rudeness and elegance of architecture to the Normans; and impute that to their use of certain materials, while it refers this to their disuse of them, as if a difference of materials could ever give a difference of architecture, and turn rudeness itself into very elegance; when, all the while, the

the whole church, "totam ecclesiam," and when the screen, lying so immediately close to Lanfranc's, with the other heads on the springs of the arches, "about fifty feet below the choir" (p. 53), therefore arbitrary and artificial in itself, was apparently set up by Paul as the terminating line betwixt the old work and his new. But, at p. 93 and 52, Mr. Newcome is imprudent enough to affirm, concerning the dedication of the church under abbot Richard, in 1115, that this proves Paul to have "made a perfect new structure from " the ground, and not a repair of the old church;" though the church had been always dedicated to St. Alban, though it has continued dedicated to St. Alban ever since, and though the dedication of 1115, therefore, can mean merely the re-opening of it for service. The church of Ely, which was so burnt by the Danes, as that the clergy, "prout poterant, "porticus ecclesiæ re-sarcientes, divinum officium solvebant;" but which was so rebuilt by Brythnoth, that "ex parte—lapsa, velut nova, non sine grandi labore adimplevit, ac deinde, " tectis reparatis quæ fuerant igne consumpta, templum rursus ædificatum, non minus " eximium aut eminens quàm priùs, apparuit;" was yet dedicated anew, "dedicationis " diem obtinuerunt," and the dedication was merely a re-opening, "juxta ritum dedica- " tionis templi in hymnis et confessionibus Deum benedicebant, sicque post sancta missa- " rum veneranda officia—festum agebant." (Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 602, 604, 605.) The same church also has a reconstruction in one part, and an addition in another, yet is again dedicated. "Ipse—ædificavit," says the same historian, concerning a bishop consecrated in 1229, "novum opus ecclesiæ nostræ versus orientem a fundamentis—, ipse etiam " construxit de novo turrim ligneam versus Galilæam ab opere cæmentario usque ad sum- " mitatem—; novo opere constructo, tota ecclesia—dedicata erat." (Ibid. 636.)

† P. 45.

same sort of materials was actually used in the elegant and in the rude parts of the building! “Paul’s building was not formed either wholly “or principally of the Roman tile.” It was formed, as I have already shewn, “of the materials collected and reserved by his predecessors.” What then were these materials? Ealdred’s are declared expressly to have been “whole tiles and such stones as he found fit for a building ‡.” Eadmer’s are expressly said to have been “ancient slabs of stone, with “tiles and pillars §.” And, when Paul at last applied them to their destined use, they are noticed as being the “the stones and tiles of the “ancient city Verolam ||.” The Roman tile, therefore, hardly constituted a part of Paul’s materials; as the stones alone are pronounced to have been “found fit for a building.” “This construction,” however, cries Mr. Newcome again, concerning the eastern half of the church, “is “said to be entirely built of brick, that is, of the Roman tile ¶.” By whom is this said? By M. Paris, as Mr. Newcome should have reported; but by Paris in such a manner, as precludes for ever Mr. Newcome’s restriction of brick to tile. He who has just before averred Paul to have re-edified “the church and the other buildings—with the stones “and tiles of—Verolam,” comes again averring Paul to have constructed “the church—with many other edifices, of brick work *.” Tile therefore is not all that is meant by such work, as real bricks are at least included under the name. But in fact they are not merely included, now appearing to be the very “stones—found fit for a building,” and, as such, opposed directly to tiles. So strangely has Mr. Newcome applied the assertion of Paris uncited, to a part of the church which (according to his own account) must be in fact and reality “entirely “built of—the Roman tile,” because “the rudeness of this work is “entirely owing to the rude and untractable nature of the materials,

‡ M. Paris, 994: “Tegulas—integras, et lapides quos invenit aptus [aptos] ad ædificia “seponens,” &c.

§ M. Paris, 995: “Antiquos tabulatus lapideos, cum tegulis et columnis.”

|| M. Paris, 1001: “Ex lapidibus et tegulis veteris civitatis Verolamii.”

¶ P. 45.

* M. Paris, 1002: “Paulus—totam ecclesiam Sancti Albani, cum multis aliis ædificiis, “opere construxit lateritio.”

“ which

“ which are wholly of the Roman tile †;” when Paris actually declares the materials of Paul to have been brick as well as tile, and when the whole is therefore denominated by Paris a pile of brick-work. “ The “ slabs of stone” and the “ pillars,” which equally with the tiles and bricks were collected from the ruins of Verulam, were not used in the construction; because they had been actually sold before, as articles much more saleable than the others, by Leofric the tenth abbot ‡. Even in those parts west of the screen, which appear plainly to have been the construction of Paul, Mr. Newcome errs as egregiously as before; affirming “ the beautiful part,” which is peculiarly Paul’s, because it bears Lanfranc’s head upon it, to have been built “ of stone” as “ entirely,” as the opposed arches on the north are “ of the Roman “ tile §.” But, as the “ stone” of Paul appears plainly to have been mere brick, this substitution of real stone for it cannot be allowed to Mr. Newcome. The building materials, in truth, are uniformly the same through the two grand parts of the church; not desultorily, tile here and stone there, or stone and tile united at times, as Mr. Newcome varyingly fancies; not “ entirely Roman brick, fetched by the “ abbots from the old city,” as Dr. Stukeley imagines, in “ the ancient “ part of the monastic church and the STEEPLE ||;” but brick, fetched “ from the old city,” for the Norman only, for parts west of the screen, not for the STEEPLE, therefore, not for any parts east of the screen at all, and tile used in all “ the ancient” or Ante-Norman “ parts.” That the “ ancient” were British, is plain from there being no Saxon; and that those were formed of tile alone, which had been burned by the Romans cotemporary with the erection, however strange it certainly seems to have a church of tiles, is equally plain from the composition of the western front, which, at the demolition of it, about the year 1200, is attested by Paris to have been “ compacted of indissoluble cement and “ ancient tiles ¶.” We thus form a difference of materials very striking

† P. 45.

‡ M. Paris, 995: “ Antiquos tabulatus lapideos.”

§ P. 94.

|| Stukeley’s Itin. Cur. 117.

¶ M. Paris, 1047: “ Murum frontis ecclesie nostræ, veteribus tegulis et cæmento in-“ dissolubili compactum.”

in itself for the parts, old or new, not what Mr. Newcome has suggested, all stones in the new and all tiles in the old; but all tiles in the old, all bricks in the new, and no stones (except on the shields or heads) in either new or old. Hence does the whole church, in full conformity with its history, upon chipping away its seeming face of stone, to this day, shew us the redness of brick beneath; of brick, either as in its proper dimensions of brick, or as reduced into the tenuity of tile. We thus sweep away at once with the gigantic hand of history, all that frivolity of reasoning from a falsity of allegation, which Mr. Newcome has repeatedly produced, to account for the rudeness and the elegance of different parts in the same church! And we can now say with a triumphant inversion of his meaning, “as to the very rude part of the “building, viz. the four piers and arches that support the tower, the “whole of the choir, THE TWO TRANSEPTS, and the five arches above “mentioned,” on the north; “the rudeness” does argue something, even much, even very much, “for its” and their “antiquity,” and for “its being a mark of originality” severally to all*. The rudeness of the plain parts, and the elegance of the beautiful, serve respectively to prove, in union with history, the posterior and the prior parts of the whole †.

At last then have we found a British church, not hid behind even the thin veil of history, but coming forward to our very senses; that has a

* P. 94.

† With this notice of tiles and bricks at Verulam, all confessedly “made on the spot” by the Romans (p. 27), Mr. Newcome is contradictory enough to say, in p. 283, that “tiles and bricks of clay, and burnt, were invented about 1440, and not earlier.” He even adds, in p. 481, that the house at Gorham, close to the walls of Verulam, which in the text is said to have been “perhaps built when abbot Robert first granted these lands to his kinsman from Gorham in Normandy;” in a note shews “on demolishing the same a few years ago,—the walls had been built in chest-work, long before the invention of brick or “regular building in stone.” Yet, in p. 502, we find that this antediluvian house is really later than the coming of the “kinsman from Gorham in Normandy,” as “the foundations “of the first original house, here built and inhabited by Robert de Gorham, are discernible “in the present park, situate eastward of the new mansion.” But, in p. 502, 481, we even find from tradition, and an inscription united, that this antediluvian house was actually finished so late as the tenth of Elizabeth.

cross reaching out its arms north and south, with a BELL-TOWER on the four arches over the very intersection of the cross. Nor is this tower and this cross merely what had been built, like St. Saviour's at Canterbury, perhaps, a little before the departure of the Romans out of Britain; but what the Romans had built at Verulam a hundred and forty years before, in their first transports of zeal for Christianity at the end of a violent persecution, and in their first effusions of triumph over the last, the most violent of all which their religion had ever endured before. We have indeed been long and laboriously employed in digging down to this mine; yet the rich vein of ore, which we have found at the bottom of our shaft, has amply repaid us for all our trouble ‡.

To these accounts of our ancient churches, however long the accounts are, I cannot but add another, very short indeed, yet equally unnoticed hitherto, and strikingly conclusive in itself. When the church of Ramsey abbey was built, so early as 969, and "the work," says the historian, "rises every day higher; two TOWERS appeared above the

‡ Mr. Newcome, p. 94, conjectures, from the Saracen captives in the crusades being once given by the king of Portugal "to serve the builders in the repairs of the churches;" that "hence" the Gothic "may have been called the Saracenic architecture," when it was so called first on a mere guess, by Sir Christopher Wren. See the Parentalia. On this guess, however, so many of our best critics, Lowth, Warburton, &c. have grounded the fantastical humour of denominating the Gothic style the Saracenic; that Mr. Newcome goes to search for the origin in the clouds, and very near the fountain of the Nile, to suppose the Nile derived from the moon. "The crusades," cries Mr. Warton, "—dictated the pointed arch." (Observations on Spenser, ii. 188.) So have said a hundred others. But they have all said so from guess at first, and against fact at last. This I have shewn decisively, in the present work. Yet it is equally shewn by another writer, from an actual survey of Saracenic buildings. "In the buildings I have had opportunities of examining in Spain and "in Sicily," says a judicious and observant traveller over both countries, "I have never been able to discover any thing like an original design, from which the Gothic ornaments might be supposed to be copied. The arches used in our old cathedrals, are pointed; those of the Saracens are almost semicircular, whenever they are not turned in the form a horse-shoe." (Swinburne in Spain, ii. 262.) Such, therefore, are the airy conjectures with which scholars, like schoolboys with their paper kites, enlightened perhaps by a lantern at their tail, delight to amuse their hours of leisure, engage their eyes with a transitory lustre, and attract the gaze of the public to it!

"very “ very summit of the roof, the lesser of which was in the front of the “ minster to the west, and presented a fine object from afar to the en“ terers into the aisle, but the greater stood IN THE MIDDLE OF THE FOUR “ DIVISIONS OF THE CHURCH, upon four columns that were preserved “ from warping with the weight, by arches reaching from the one to “ the other.” This was “ an edifice sufficiently respectable,” as the writer goes on with all a Norman’s ambition for novelty and greatness in structures; “ upon that style of building which was used in those “ days of old antiquity *.” Here then we have a Saxon church exhibited to our view by the pencil, in all the pomp and pride of a modern cathedral; with a small tower at the western end of the front of the whole, and a large tower upon the intersection of the cross aisle, as the centre of the whole, both apparently bell-towers, and both actually furnished with bells, as king Edgar, the historian subjoins, “ when the “ first foundations of this minster were laid,” among other presents gave it “ two bells, purchased at the expense of twenty pounds †.”

But before I close the section, let me make one remark concerning some of these bell-towers, that is necessary to complete the whole of what I have said. “ The towers in Saxon cathedrals,” cries the ingenious Mr. Warton, and ought in propriety to have said the Norman, as from Norman his proofs are all taken, “ were not always “ intended for bells. They were [sometimes] calculated to produce the “ effect of the louver, or open lantern, in the inside; and, on this “ account, were originally continued open almost to the covering. It “ is generally supposed, that the tower of Winchester cathedral,” which was not Saxon but Norman, as built about the year 1090, yet

* Gale, i. 339: “ Opus indies altius consurgit. Duæ quoque turres ipsis tectorum cul-“ minibus eminebant, quarum minor versus occidentem in fronte basilicæ pulchrum intran-“ tibus insulam à longè spectaculum præbebat, major verò in quadrifidæ structuræ medio “ columnas quatuor, porrectis de aliâ ad aliam arcibus sibi invicem connexas, ne laxè “ defluerent, deprimebat. Juxta eam quâ vetus illa antiquitas utebatur ædificandi formam, “ spectabile satis ædificium.”

† Gale, i. 402: “ Cum igitur prima [primis] hujus basilicæ fundamenta [fundamentis]
 “ illustris rex Ædgarus—dedit—duas campanas xx^{ti} librarum pretio comparatas.”

“ which is remarkably thick and short, was left as the foundation for a “ projected spire; but this idea never entered into the plan of the “ architect. Nearly the whole inside of this tower was formerly seen “ from below; and, for that reason, its side arches or windows, of the “ first story at least, are artificially wrought and ornamented. With “ this sole effect in view, the builder saw no necessity to carry it higher.
 “ An instance of this visibly subsists at present, in the inside of the “ neighbouring Saxon church of Saint Cross, built about the same “ time,” equally built not by the Saxons, but by the Normans, even about the year 1132. “ The same effect was at first designed at Salis- “ bury” cathedral, built still later by the Normans, even about 1250; “ where, for the same purpose solely, was a short tower, the end of “ which is easily discerned by critical observers; being but little higher “ than the roof of the church, and of less refined workmanship than that “ additional part, on which the present spire is constructed. Many “ other examples might be pointed out. This gave the idea, for the “ *beautiful lanterns at Peterborough and Ely.” These remarks, as corrected, are critically curious in themselves, and seem to be historically just, being founded upon actual observation. The concluding assertion, particularly, shews us the source and origin of lanterns at our cathedrals. Yet it wants authentication. The ornamental architecture at some of these towers within, even nearly up to the roof, shews they were designed to be viewed so high from below. But still where is the proof, for this transition of the open tower into a lantern? I have discovered, I think, what is a decisive proof of this transition, what had suggested it to me before I observed it in Mr. Warton. Walter Skirlaw, made bishop of Durham in 1388, but born in Yorkshire, “ at “ the minster of York,” says the historian of Durham, “ constructed a “ great part of that campanile, which is vulgarly denominated the lan- “ tern†.” The original name for one of these lanterns or louvers, therefore, was actually a campanile. Thus also the tower that fell down

* Warton on Spenser, ii. 195.

† Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 775: “Magnam partem campanilis, vulgo lanternii, mini- “ sterii Eboracensis construxit;” and Godwin, 751.

at Ely in 1322, appears to have had no bells, yet is expressly styled a campanile by the historian of Ely; and the very dome crowned with a lantern, that was erected in the room of it, is equally styled a campanile, by him*. The name concurs with the circumstances, to ascertain the origin of our lanterns beyond a doubt. From an open cylinder, all pervious to the eye below, as all lighted up with windows above, and therefore shewing an ornamental architecture through all the ascent nearly up to the roof; the tower that was not destined for bells, that was yet denominated a bell-tower from its aspect, was changed into a tower all windowed round, completely luminous within, and thoroughly transparent without, a rich addition to the beauty of some cathedrals, a happy effusion of some architectural genius†. But I can come still closer to the lantern. We have steeples in Normandy that are bell-towers and louvers at once. “There are very few towers to the churches in this province,” says a late traveller there, who was particularly curious about church-architecture, “the fashion running almost every where into “spires or steeples,” or (as he should have said) into spire-steeples; “some of which are so contrived with open-work, as to let in light enough to see the bells move‡.” Yet was the lantern formed so late as Mr. Warton’s proofs and mine seem to fix it? Certainly not. Two churches in Normandy prove it was not. The abbey-church of St. Stephen, at Caen, was begun in 1064, and dedicated in 1077, yet has a lantern, with a spire in the centre above; as the cathedral of Rouen, begun about 990, and dedicated in 1063, has the transept of the cross, forming a “beautiful lantern,” with a lofty spire upon it. So nearly coeval were lanterns, with bells, with towers, and with spires, among us!

* Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 643, 644: “Ecce subito et repente ruit campanile super “chorum,” but the sacrist set to work “novum campanile—constructurus,” and so erected the lantern, “illa artificiosa structura lignea novi campanilis.”

† That at Ely is accordingly described by the Ely historian, as a structure “summo ac “mirabili mentis ingenio imaginata.” (Wharton, i. 644.)

‡ Ducarrel, 97.

SECTION III.

IN this manner was a church erected at St. German's, and dedicated to the memory of him who had, in this as well as in other parts of the island, laid himself out in painful and honourable exertions for the cause of sacred truth, against the presumptuous absurdity of Pelagianism. Germanus had thus become another Hercules in attacking another Hydra, had been as successful as Hercules in quelling it, and then, like Hercules, been deified after his death by the too lively gratitude of his admirers. Yet he had a still nearer claim to the admiration and the gratitude of the Cornish sovereign; from the zeal which the latter had seen or felt himself probably, as it lightened in the looks or on the lips of the apostolical preacher; and from the general goodness, general devoutness, which the king had contemplated assuredly with awful veneration, as it played in a lambent flame of glory around the person of this apostolical man, during the whole of his residence with him. Both contributed to fix his name upon that church and parish, which he in all probability induced the king to build and to form. Nor let such a scrupulosity of caution, as is ever stopping or starting in the safest course, because it is ignorant of the way, and finds itself moving in darkness; alarm us with apprehensions of turning aside into a ditch, or falling headlong into a pit, when we refer the present appellation of the parish and church, to so very early a date. Facts shall be our guide. We have another church of Britain, bearing the name of another saint still earlier. When Christianity came forward in the persons of Augustine and his associates, to reclaim the Saxons from paganism and savageness; "there was near the "very city of Canterbury," let me repeat from Bede, "upon the "eastern side of it, a church, built in those former times, in which the "Romans yet inhabited Britain; and THEN dedicated TO THE HONOUR "OF SAINT MARTIN*." But we can mount with Saint Martin still higher in time. Nynian, "that most reverend bishop and that most

* Bede Hist. i. 26: "Erat autem propè ipsam civitatem, ad orientem, ecclesia in "honorem Sancti Martini antiquitus facta, dum adhuc Romani Britanniam incolerent."

"holy

“ holy man, of the nation of the Britons,” of whom I have spoken so largely just before, but “ who was regularly educated at Rome in the faith and mysteries of truth; had his episcopal see” at Whithorn, in Galloway, as I have already shewn, “ distinguished by a church dedicated from SAINT MARTIN THE BISHOP,” whom he had visited at his see of Tours, in France, about the year 394*, and who died a few years afterward, even in the year 401†. We thus behold another bishop of Gaule about fifty years before Germanus, revered in his life, sainted at his death, and, from private or public veneration in the builders, denominating almost instantly no less than two of our churches in Britain. Nor is this all the proof that we can adduce. A whole century prior to all, even as early as about 312, when the last persecution ceased; we see the Britons in general “ erecting minsters to their holy martyrs,” as I have already remarked, and those of Verulam in particular erecting one “ in honour of their blessed martyr St. Alban‡.”

So named, our church must have been only a small one, as that of St. Martin remains at Canterbury to this day; and proportioned in size to the thin population of the parish. Even when it was pulled down and rebuilt, to make it the cathedral of Cornwall; it was not made large. It was still a parochial church, though it was also a cathedral one; a full evidence that it existed as parochial before it became cathedral. The rector still continued in his parsonage-house, on the western side of the church; while the bishop settled at a house which the king must have built for him, upon the wooded prominence of Cuddenbeak adjoining. “ At this day,” says Leland, concerning the see of St. German’s, “ the bishop of Exeter hathe a place cauled Cudden Beke, “ joyning hard upon the sowth est side of the same towne§.” But “ at

* Bede, iii. 4: “ Nynia episcopo reverentissimo, et sanctissimo viro, de natione Britonum, qui erat Romæ regulariter fidem et mysteria veritatis edoctus; ejus sedem episcopalem, Sancti Martini episcopi nomine et ecclesiâ insignem,” &c. See also the note. —I have used pretty nearly the whole of the fact here, in ii. 2, before, for another purpose.

† Usher, 434.

‡ Gildas, viii.: “ Basilicas sanctorum martyrum:” Bede, i. 7, “ Ecclesia—ejus martyrio condigna;” and M. Paris, ‘984, “ In honorem beati martyris constructam.”

§ Leland’s Itin. vii. 122.

“the town’s end,” as Carew speaks, “Cuddenbeak, an ancient house “of the bishop’s, from a well-advanced promontory—taketh a pleasant “prospect of the river *.” On that fine position, about a quarter of a mile to the south-east of the church, tradition fixes the episcopal house; and there, to this day, remain under all the demolitions, that even the memory of the last generation reported, and the tongue of the present repeats, some buildings which speak their own antiquity, which shew by their closed arches they are only a part of what was once there, and are believed by all to be certainly episcopal, now fitted up into a farmhouse. The present kitchen of this was the hall of that, being within memory all open up to the very roof, and having no chambers over it as it has now. Upon one side of this is an arched doorway, leading into what is now the dairy, but was then (I believe) the buttery; as upon another side is a second and taller arch for a doorway, filled up with stone, but once opening (I suppose) into the kitchen, now demolished.
Thence the bishop walked with his chaplain to the church, and entered it by a door reserved entirely for himself; while the rector (I suppose from the same principle) entered it by another door, the westerly one of the porch, as the nearest to his house; and the parishioners entered by a third, even the southerly door of the porch. This distribution of doors is very remarkable. I have observed it practised at another of our superior churches, though not half so ancient as St. German’s, the collegiate church of Manchester, in the entrances into the chapterhouse, and in the accesses into the quire. I therefore believe it to have been practised in all, and to be still observable in all to a critical eye on examination. It shews in a very lively manner that grand system of subordination among us, which is so necessary to the maintenance of order in a society of angels themselves, which is a thousand times more necessary in one of fallen vitiated beings like men, and which our wise forefathers rigorously kept up in justice to morality, in justice to themselves. The westerly door of the porch was undoubtedly the principal entrance into the parochial church; the cathedral, with its door, being not yet built. That the porch was prior to the cathedral, may be decisively shewn. There is a plain line of separation at this day between it and the south aisle, running along the wall at the union of both without, and forming a direct perpendicular there. This proves them to have been built at different times, and the south aisle to have been annexed to the porch, as well as to the southern tower: the porch is coeval with the tower, along which it ranges, and combined with it originally to make the western end of the parochial church, as it afterwards made of the cathedral.

In this state of the church the body of it was taken down and rebuilt, rebuilt with a height not so lofty, shrinking down in its roof from the water-table of its predecessor, but receiving all the symbols and signatures of a cathedral, the cenotaph, the door, or the throne, for the bishop, and the stall for his chaplain. The chancel was not ascended by steps from the nave, as it is in our present cathedrals generally, but goes on in the same level with the nave, as it went in the parochial church probably, and in the Roman church of Canterbury certainly; having only one step of ascent, so slight as to be mis-named a step, and just serving barely to discriminate the chancel from the nave.

Athelstan then came; left the parochial, the cathedral church just as he found it, still cathedral, still parochial; and left also a part of the rectory-house to stand, but turned it into offices for his new house. Multiplying the one rector into eight, a prior and seven subordinate clergymen, he raised his house upon a larger scale, proportioned to the larger number of incumbents; he also made a grand addition to the church, suited to the grandeur of the new parsonage-house, and appropriated to the use of the new family there; a new church uniting with the old, modelled in conformity to it, thus combining the old and the new by a happy regularity of plan into one complete whole. By this act he gave the solitary bishop and his chaplain in some measure the dignity of a chapter; certainly a number of his clergy congregated around him, and confederated with him in the liturgic ministries of the cathedral. But he left the bishop, his chaplain, and the parishioners, to the use of their old church in their old manner; only constructing another cenotaph in the

the southern wall of his chancel, just as he saw one in the body of the British church, to mark as honourably a place of sepulture for the new bishops as had been previously marked for the old; and at last came “the Norman ambition” of building, to do what reflects high honour upon it, to superadd the grand portal with the northern tower to all.

Thus do we mount up at last to the very sources of the several streams, to the very periods of constructing the several parts of this church, and to the very epocha of its first commencement. The southern tower, once octangular, and so causing the northern, in a judicious accommodation of style, to be made as it still is, octangular too, remains a striking memorial in its water-table of a church previous to the cathedral, but loftier than it in the roof: the porch, too, being evidently built together with the southern tower, being visibly incorporated into it at the very moment of building, remains equally a striking memorial of a previous church, as large in the breadth, and therefore probably as extensive in the length, as the cathedral. The porch and the southern tower are thus two very extraordinary relics of antiquity, each illustrating and confirming the other; two monuments of the Romans just before their departure, or of the Roman Britons just after it. The cathedral annexed to them is not so old, but still a monument very extraordinary too, being as old probably as the year 614, certainly as old as the first erection of an episcopal see in Cornwall; a natural, a significant evidence in itself, in the smallness, in the lowness of the very cathedral of Cornwall, to how humble a state the Britons of Cornwall, and of all the kingdom, were reduced at the time of building it. It thus exhibits also such ancient simple memorials of British episcopacy within it; a throne, only an ornamented niche in the wall; a chaplain's stall, only another niche; an arched doorway, for the peculiar entrance of the bishop; and an arched tomb, to mark the place of his peculiar sepulture. The throne, particularly, is such a memorial as is not to be paralleled in the whole island, I apprehend; yet is so little known, even within its own region of Cornwall, that the very antiquaries of the region know nothing of it; that Willis, that Borlase were as ignorant of it as the merest peasants of our villages; and that I was all un-

apprized

apprized of its existence for twelve or fourteen years of my residence in the county. The nave, too, the chancel, and the north aisle, appear to be the very fabrication of Athelstan, coæval with the new church at Bodmin, or the new church at Padstow, and coæval equally with those colleges of clergy which he established at all the three places. Then the northern tower and the fine portal close the sum of successive additions to the original building; all bearing, with the original, the name of Germanus; all uniting thus to keep up the memory of this saint, who had been once resident in the parish, who had exerted great zeal of spirit, and exhibited great holiness of life within it, had even occasioned probably that parish to be first formed, and that church to be first built, upon their present positions. Thus Romans, or Roman Britons; the Cornish dispossessed of East-Devonshire, and confined to the west of the Exe; the Saxons, under their victorious conqueror of West-Devonshire, with Cornwall afterwards; and the Normans, under another conqueror, with a still higher fondness for enlarging churches, with indeed the collected refinements of the continent, have all combined their efforts together to produce the present church of Saint German's.

Tantæ molis erat Romanam condere gentem!

SECTION IV.

THERE "is a towne cawled S. Germainys," Leland observes in a passage that I must bring before my reader a second time, "wherin is "now a priori [church] of blake chanons, and a parochie chirche yn
 "the body of the same. Beside the hye altare of the same priory
 "[church], on the ryght hand, ys a tumber yn the walle with an ymage
 "of a bishop, and over the tumber a xi. bishops paynted, with their "names and verses, as token of so many bishops biried there, or that "ther had beene so many bishoppes of Cornewalle, that had theyr secte
 " [seate]

“ [seate] theer*.” This memorable circumstance in the private history of our church, which has enabled us, in concurrence with other circumstances, to ascertain the respective ages of the first and second parts of the whole, would have been totally lost to history if Leland’s eye had not noticed, and Leland’s pen had not recorded it. The integrity of historical truth depends upon such a number of precarious contingencies in a world like our own, as seems to make another history of human events, one that cannot be affected by the incidents of human life, one that is drawn from the full annals of every individual of our species, absolutely necessary to the complete satisfaction of our minds. The historian of earth will thus be engaged in writing history within the regions of heaven; in consulting those records of private plans, and private actions, which present the soul with the body of public events, and in writing particular portions of history from them. Thus only can man ever come, even in heaven, to gain that perfect knowledge of the human annals to which the inclination of his mind strongly leads him, in which the vigorousness of his spirit may be usefully employed, and by which the religiousness of his affections may be happily indulged.

Leland, however, notices “ a tumbe yn the walle, with an ymage of “ a bishop.” This image appears plainly to have been placed upon the tomb itself. There was “ a tumbe,—with an ymage of a bishop” upon it; an image of wood or stone, lying recumbent upon the tomb. And this bishop was as plainly Conan, the first who was fixed in the see by the English crown, the first who could be buried in the English chancel of the church, the first who could have his image upon the English cenotaph within it†.

* Leland’s Itin. vii. 122. I have noticed the passage also in ii. 4, preceding.

† Leland’s Itin. viii. 8. At Durham cathedral these bishops are buried, “ in choro, “ Skirlaw ad boream sub arcu, Hatfeld ad austrum sub arcu ;” ibid. 21, “ S. Wilfridi reliquiae sub arcu prope mag. altare sepultæ, nuper sublatae ;” iii. 94, for Salisbury cathedral, “ ther is also a sepulchre, with an image of 4 fote in lenght of a bishop ;” ibid. 124, for Wells cathedral, “ quatuor tumuli et imagines episcoporum Wellen. quæ referunt mag-nam vetustatem ;—quatuor tumuli episcoporum Wellensium, quorum tres imagines habent “ [tres habent imagines] antiquitatem referentes.”

Yet “over the tumbe,” adds Leland, by the distinguishing variation of his language confirming what I have here derived from his language preceding, and shewing the “ymage” to be not over but upon the tomb; are “a xi. bishops,” not in images, but “paynted †.” These were therefore posterior in time to the other, as the successors of Conan in the see; all appointed, like him, by the English crown, and all, like him, buried in the ground adjoining. They had their persons represented in paintings on the wall over the tomb, but under the arch that protected the tomb; they were even “paynted, with their names” to each, the personal appellation being annexed, in order to appropriate the painting ‡: they had even “verses” subjoined, in order to state the character, and to date the life of each. All shews the painting was made, the name prefixed, and the verse subjoined at the very sepulture of each.

Had Leland, therefore, extended his accuracy of notation a little farther, gone on to copy what he has thus described, and given us the names with the verses in order as they stood, we should have been indulged with a ray of light, of which we must now lament the privation for ever: but he who was so accurate as to notice, would certainly have been accurate enough to describe, if he could have read. The antiquity of the verses and names must have rendered them illegible in his time; it had not indeed obliterated them entirely, it had only effaced them partially. The figures of the eleven bishops remained upon the wall, still visible to the eye in the outline, yet just fading away into nonentity: the place of the name perhaps was attested only by the traces of a gilded scroll over head, while the verse existed merely in some half-perished letters at the foot, running in a semblance of parallel lines, and shewing a shadow of evanescent poetry. Nor could any eye, I suppose, however acute in itself, however exercised in antiquarian acuteness, have known the verses, the names, and the paintings, to be what they were, if tradition had not come in to assist the sight, to lend its useful microscope to the eye, and to make the antiquary behold what time had been so long erasing; yet time had been so far successful in its operations, that even an antiquary's eye, so sharp, so exercised, could catch only the general fact, could learn only the existence of verses and names, but could not pretend to copy any one of either; when no less than eleven figures were painted upon the wall, with names prefixed, and verses subjoined to each, within the narrow space of the arch above the tomb: the figures must have been small, the names in short scrolls, and the verses in abbreviated inscriptions; all must have rendered the writing less transcribable in a little time, and wholly illegible, as the names were generally unknown before Leland made his visit to the church.

† In Reculver church also “is the figure of a bishop, paynted under an arch.” (Itin. vii. 136.) And at Glastonbury church, “trium tantum horum abbatum nomina rerum præteritarum recordatrix manifestat pictura,—nomina illorum et dignitates in majori ecclesiâ, prodente secus altare picturâ, sunt in propatulo.” Gale, i. 307, 308, Malmesbury.

‡ So, of three tombs bearing images of bishops at Wells cathedral, “primus tumulus sic inscriptus est BVRWOLDVS” (Itin. iii. 124), made bishop about A. D. 1000 (Godwin, 365).

In this uncertainty as to the true reading of the inscriptions, and in that inability of tradition to tell more than generals concerning any of them, Leland notes concerning the paintings, the names, and the verses, that they were put there "as token of so many bishops biried theree, "or that ther had beene so many bishoppes of Cornwalle, that had "theyr secte [seate] theer." Tradition varied in the lips of its relators, as the diamond varies in the hand of its shewer; yet, as the diamond has a real lustre, however varying, so tradition has a real substantiality of truth, amidst all its changes in circumstance. But the variation in this case is actually of no moment at all; the same rays play only from different points; nor is there any real difference whether these verses, names, and paintings were put over the tomb, as a signature that so many bishops of Cornwall had been buried at this place, or as an evidence that so many had been seated at this church. The conclusion is exactly the same either way, and the convergence of the two lines in one centre shews they issued from the same circumference; the bishops that were buried here must have been the prelates that were here seated before, and the prelates seated here must have been the same as were here buried. The position of the paintings and names in the church, and over the tomb, proves the persons so specified and so delineated, to have been prelates seated here, and here buried. Accordingly we find, in fact, when the names of prelates merely seated at the church were meant to be recited, they are recited, not over a tomb, but in the chapter-house; as Leland himself informs us concerning Sherborne, equally with our St. German's, a cathedral to the æra of the Conquest, that "the chapitre house is ancient, and yn the volte of it be payntid the images of bisshops that had their sete at Shirburn *."
here

Those at St. German's appear to have been many in number, and, could Leland have copied the verses or names, would have appeared with all their appellations, dates, or panegyrics before my reader. Malmesbury, indeed, more than six hundred years ago, could nowhere find the names of Athelstan's successors in the Cornish episcopate; as "of the Cornish pontiffs" he "did not know, and could not produce, "a regular list †." But even a Malmesbury could not be expected to ransack every private or local cell of intelligence; he could not be expected, particularly to visit the distant church of St. German's, when travelling was little practised within our own country; to read there for information any inscriptions that must have been perfectly legible at the time, and to insert (as he certainly would have inserted, if he had known) the substance of these as a competent, because a cotemporary authority, for each of the specified bishops of Cornwall.

He did not know, and Leland could not read, the inscription concerning each; yet others, who pretend not to have read, but affect to guess at what Leland could not read, presume to execute what he could not perform, and pretend to tell the names which he could not deci-

* Itin. ii. 78.

† Malmesbury, f. 146: "Cornubiensium sanè pontificum succiduum ordinem nec scio "nec appono." Nor could Leland have told us, as we have seen already, even if he had executed the work that he once designed. Concerning Anthony Bec, bishop of Durham, he says, "fusus in opere, cui titulus de pontificibus Britannicis, dicemus; nam illorum "regestas magnâ curâ exquisivi, et majori propediem in ordinem redigam." (Itin. ix. 35.)

pher: thus the nave of St. German's church exhibits in a modern writing upon the western wall the very names which the writer supposed to have been originally near the eastern. Dr. Borlase also repeats them, not upon the testimony of the wall, which then perhaps had not learnt to speak like the wall in Shakespeare; not even upon the evidence of Mr. Willis, from whom (I believe) the wall was taught by some antiquarian curate to rehearse the names, and into whose work the Doctor seems hardly to have ever looked*; but upon the authority of that Cressy, whom Mr. Willis equally adduced for his witness, and of that Heylyn, who with Cressy knew just as little upon the point as the very allegers themselves. Heylyn was one of those divines whose learning, worth, and spirit, do so much honour to the patronage of the first Charles; who actually published his list of bishops at a period peculiarly hostile to the whole order, as well as to all erudition, that mournful year of the commencing reign of fanaticism, 1641. Cressy was a divine of the same period and patronage, whose weaker mind could not bear the triumph of presbyterian barbarism, but bent before the pressure of expanding passion; who therefore threw himself with disgust into the arms of popery; was afterwards employed in defending with dignity the cause to which he had thus deserted with disgrace, and particularly published his Church History with that view in 1668. Upon this coupled but slender pillar, nodding every moment to its fall, and ready to sink at once under the weight of a fly lighting upon it, Dr. Borlase repeats the names thus: "Athelstan, Conan, Ruydocke, Aldred, Britwin, "Athelstan II. Wolf, Woron, Wolocke, Stidio, Aldred II. and Burwold †." Heylyn gives them in this form: "1. S. Patroc, he lived "circa an. 850, 2. Athelstan, 3. Conanus, 4. Ruidocus, 5. Aldredus, "6. Britwinus, 7. Athelstan II. 8. Wolfi, 9. Woronus, 10. Wolocus, "11. Stidio, 12. Aldredus, 13. Burwoldus (or Brithwoldus), the last "bishop of Cornwall ‡." Cressy exhibits only a part of the list, saying, "the first bishop was Athelstan, and after him Conan, Ruydoc, "Aldred, and Brithwin §." Cressy has thus shortened the list in

* He cites it only once, in p. 385.

‡ Heylyn, 71, 72. Wright.

† Borlase, 378, 379.

§ Cressy, 832.

Heylyn, by omitting eight of the names out of thirteen, as if he had a violent suspicion of their spuriousness; but Dr. Borlase, on the contrary, as having no suspicion, has lengthened the brevity of Cressy into all the amplitude of Heylyn again. He has then adhered to Cressy in preference to Heylyn, and omitted one name that Heylyn has recited; even his credulity declining to adopt the monstrous fiction, and therefore his pen dropping in silence from the head of the list “S. Patroc,” of the year “850.” Thus Petrock, who was only a hermit in a vale with three others, about 518-538, is put down for a prelate of Cornwall, and the first prelate of it, more than three centuries afterwards*. Athelstan also is named as the second prelate, though he lived sixty years later than the æra here assigned for Petrock, and almost four centuries later than the actual æra of Petrock. But this Athelstan is only named at all, because he was nominated by the English monarch to the see of Cornwall in 910, when Asser should have been equally named before upon the same principle. Conan we know to have been actually placed in the see during the December of 936; he was succeeded either mediately or immediately, but certainly in the course of thirty years, by one Athelstan, the same probably with Athelstan II. in the list, as a charter of 966 is subscribed thus: “I, Athelstan, bishop of Cornwall, have given my counsel to this †;” and Burwold we shall have ample occasion to notice hereafter, as bishop of Cornwall in the reign of the Confessor. Thus does the list appear to have been merely copied by Cressy in his part, and to have been actually formed in the whole by Heylyn, or by Heylyn’s authors; drawn up first from some casual intimations of history concerning the names of the first or of the second Athelstan, of Conan, or of Burwold; then enlarged by him from some

* Hals, 17, concerning his “Cornish bishops or druids” seated at Bodmin: “although the list or catalogue of their names be lost,” judiciously observed! “except St. Pedyr,” who was neither druid nor bishop, but “who lived about the 5th century, as tradition says,” very truly, “though, as Harpsfield and Campian says, anno Dom. 850, and therefore is by them placed as the first bishop among the Cornish,” when he was no bishop at all. One frequently wants a silly writer to introduce one into the company of writers as silly as himself, and so to unfold the origin of notions as silly as they are popular.

† Ingulphus, 502: “Ego Athelstanus, episcopus Cornubiensis, consilium dedi.”

traditionary list that was circulated about St. German's at the time perhaps, that was probably false in its original shape, had been certainly falsified by the rash hand of forgery afterwards, and betrays its forgery by its folly at present, in transforming a hermit into a bishop, so turning the date 518 into 850.

But in an author of much higher reputation, and much greater accuracy within the province of ecclesiastical antiquities than ever Dr. Borlase was, we find the list repeated, and even authorities pleaded to confirm it. "Conanus," cries Godwin in Richardson's own edition of his work, as he cites the names, leaving out very wisely both the Petrock of Heylyn, and the first Athelstan of the Doctor, "Ruydocus, Aldredus;" when a note subjoins concerning the last, "vixit A. 793, Ingul." This reference must naturally startle my reader in his course of conviction, and make him shrink back from my leading hand; yet let him neither shrink nor startle. Ingulphus, indeed, does mention an Aldred a bishop in the year 793, a charter of Offa's in that year being signed by such a prelate; but, by some astonishing deception of the author's eyes, not of Cornwall, not of West-Saxony, but of Mercia, of Oxfordshire, of *Dorchester. The very name of Offa fixes the charter to be Mercian, and the very date of the year proves the subscribing bishop to be no successor to Conan; the latter being bishop in 936, and the former, with one prelate interposed, living in—793, almost a whole century and a half before the man whom at such a distance he followed. Then came "Athelstan the II^d," as the author proceeds with the list, "who lived "in 966," as I have already shewn; this author, however, not attempting to shew, but contrarily remarking in a note, that "he is not "specified in a very ancient MS. among the archives of the church of "Exeter†." So much greater uncertainty is there in this whole list, and so much stronger are the contradictions in parts of it! But chronology is again violated, though not so grossly as before, by fixing a prelate at the year 966, as a successor to Aldred of 793, to Rnydock of ---, and to Conan of 936. “Wolli,” adds the continuator of the catalogue, “Woronus, Wolocus,” &c.; of whom he notes, that Wolli “claruit 1051. Ingulf.” But Ingulphus is referred to in the very same blindness of temerity as before, and only gives the signature under that year of “Wulfinus bishop of *Dorchester;” and Wolock is confessed to be “also omitted in the MS. commended above†.” So completely have all attempts to authenticate this catalogue been baffled by the very sturdiness of truth! so clearly have the very attempts served to fix the stigma of spuriousness more deeply upon it!

* Richardson, 396, and Ingulphus, 486: "Ego Aldredus episcopus Dorcasistrens. sub-notavi."

† Richardson, 396: "In MS. per-antiquo inter archivos ecclesiæ Exoniensis non nuntatur. Le Neve."

The inability of Leland to read and to transcribe the names over the tomb has produced all this confusion; curiosity could not be satisfied without recovering them; and tradition has combined with history, weakness has united with wantonness to satisfy it, to raise up the dead from their graves, or to make their phantoms appear as their representatives. All these prelates, however, pretend merely to be such alone as the English crown appointed to the see of Cornwall: this is plain from the name of Athelstan standing at the head of the list, and the name of Conan following immediately afterwards. Thus all the prelates that were nominated by the Cornish sovereigns themselves, are entirely omitted in this pretendedly full catalogue of the prelates of Cornwall. This was equally the case also in that catalogue of bishops upon the chancel-wall, which Leland could not read; these bishops could not be older than the wall itself, and their memorials must have been fixed upon it posterior to the erection of the chancel. Leland accordingly tells us in the passage above, that there “ys a tumbe yn the walle with “an image of a bishop, and over the tumbe a xi. bishops paynted with “their names and verses;” yet retells us in another work, that Conan was appointed bishop of St. German’s by king Athelstan, but that “there were successively eleven bishops in the church of St. Ger-

* Ingulphus, 519: “Ego Wulfinus episcopus Dorcestrensis ratificavi.”

† Richardson, 396: “Et hic etiam omittitur in MS. suprâ laudato.”

“man’s ¶.” The two passages unite to shew, that Conan had eleven prelates in regular succession after him.

One of the prelates nominated by the kings of Cornwall, antecedently to Athelstan’s appointment of Conan, we know by name, and we honour from character. “RUMON.” we are informed by Malmesbury in his account of Tavistock abbey. “is there extolled as a saint, and lies buried “as a BISHOP, being decorated with a beautiful shrine; concerning “whom all want of written evidence confirms the opinion, that not “only in this but in many parts of England, you will find all knowledge “of events swept away by the violence of hostility, the names of saints “left naked, and any miracles that may aspire to our notice unre- “corded*.” We have thus the positive attestation of Malmesbury, that Rumon was a bishop. Yet of what see was he? Of Crediton, or of St. German’s? Certainly not of Crediton, and therefore as certainly of St. German’s. All the bishops of Crediton are named in succession by Malmesbury himself, and there is no Rumon among them. “Here sat “these pontiffs in order,” cries Malmesbury concerning Crediton, “Edulf, Edelgar, Elfwood, Sideman, Alfrie, Elfwood, Ednod, who is “also Wine, Living,—Leofrie †.” But “of the Cornish pontiffs,” he adds, “I do not know and cannot produce a regular list ‡.” In fact he ¶ Leland’s Coll. i. 75: “Erexit in ecclesiâ S. Germani quendam Conanum episcopum. “—Fuerunt successivè undecim episcopi in ecclesiâ S. Germani.”

* Malmesbury, 146: “Rumonus Sanctus ibi prædicatur et jacet episcopus, pulchritudine decoratus scrinii; ubi nulla scriptorum fides assistit opinioni, quòd non solum ibi, “sed in multis locis Angliæ, invenies violentiâ hostilitatis abolitam omnem gestorum notitiam, nuda sanctorum nomina, et siquæ modò prætendunt miracula seiri.”

† Malmesbury, 145: “Hic sederunt per ordinem pontifices isti, Edulfus, Edelgar, Elfwood, Sideman, Alfrie, Elfwood, Ednod, qui et Wine, Livingus,—Lefricus.” But to shew still more than I have already shewn the erroneusness, with which the common catalogues of our bishops are made, even when the makers have only the trouble of transcribing; let me here adduce a part of Heylyn’s catalogue of the Crediton bishops, “Ædulfus I. Putta” interpolated; “Ædulfus II.” equally interpolated, “Ethelgarus, Algarus” equally interpolated, “Alfwoldus I.” “Alfwolfus” equally interpolated, &c.

‡ Malmesbury, 146: “Cornubiensium sane pontificum succeduum ordinem nec scio nec “appono.”

produces

produces no list at all. Rumon, therefore, must fill up one of these empty niches in the temple of history, and form one name more in the nearly void catalogue of Cornish prelates. What niche indeed he is to fill, or in what part his name is to be enrolled among the prelates nominated by our Cornish sovereigns; must depend upon the period in which he lived, prior to Athelstan's reduction of Cornwall.

Nor is this so difficult to be ascertained as it seems to be; Malmesbury, when he mentioned the total want of notices concerning Rumon, vainly measuring the world's ignorance by his own; and Leland discovering what Malmesbury could not find, even after the lapse of four centuries between them. At that very Tavistock too, which Malmesbury appears, from the particularity of his descriptive touches concerning it, to have personally visited; and at which, therefore, he so pathetically laments "all want of written evidence" relative to Rumon; even there did Leland find a written account of Rumon*. So strangely negligent at times are the most accurate historians; and so singularly benumbed do they occasionally appear, by the freezing spirit of indolence! Every writer feels it too much in himself, and sees it too much in his own writings, not to recognise it with tenderness in others. There Leland met with a formal life of Rumon, and usefully made extracts from it. In these, Rumon appears to have been one of the many saints who came over from Ireland into Cornwall, in order to court that holy solitude, and to enjoy that heavenly contemplation in our vallies and upon our shores; to which they had solemnly devoted their lives, and from which they were apprehensive of being drawn away, by the solicitations of their friends near them. They thus passed the sea to preclude the temptation, and secured themselves from the danger by the impossibility of a trial; wise, however, in their very exercise of timidity, and strong from the very sense of their weakness. The scene of Rumon's retirement is fixed, by his biographer, in terms that indicate the latter to have written when his names were well known in the county. "THE NEMLEAN WOOD, in Cornwall," he observes, "was formerly very full of wild beasts; SAINT RUMON MADE AN ORATORY FOR HIMSELF IN THE NEMLEAN WOOD †." But where was this wood, so similarly denominated with one in ancient Arcadia? It was not, like that, in the bosom of the peninsula. It was not in the Arcadian park of Cornwall at all. It was on the exposed and beaten prominence that shoots out into the Lizard; as a single word extracted from the Life serves to shew, and as some local notices unite to confirm. Immediately after Leland has rehearsed from the biographer, that "Rumon made an oratory for himself in the Nemean wood;" he subjoins, in a distinct line, this local appellation, "Falemutha," as an equal extract from the biographer, and as the biographer's notation of the vicinity of the site to Falmouth ‡. The harbour of this name has been better known to the English from the numerous advantages which it enjoys, in the narrow-divided avenue into it, in the broad bosom which it displays within, in the many creeks that run up into the land from it, in the general depth of water through all, and in the general security of all from winds; than any other point in the whole compass of Cornwall, I believe, through all the periods of our history. Just such is the case with Milford Haven, in Wales, at present. That has therefore borne so long the English appellation of Falmouth, and this of Milford Haven, as to have lost all traces, all memory, of their Cornish or their Welsh names*.

* Malmesbury, 146: "Locus amœnus opportunitate nemorum, capturâ copiosâ piscium, ecclesiæ congruente fabricâ, fluvialibus rivis per officinas monachorum decurrentibus, qui, suo impetu effusi, quicquid invenerunt superfluum portant in exitum.—Cernitur in eodem monasterio sepulchrum Ordgari, spectaculoque ducitur enormitas mausolii filii ejus." Leland's Coll. iv. 152: "Tavestoke. Kilwardeby super libros priorum: Lincolniensis super libros posteriorum eulogium Joannis Cornubiensis ad Alexandrum papam. Constantinus Aphricanus, monachus Cassinensis, de re medicâ. S. Rumonus sepultus apud Tavestoke."

We

† Leland's Coll. iv. 152, 153: "Ex Vitâ Rumoni. 'Rumonus genere fuit Scôtus Hiberniensis.'—Nemea Sylva.—'Nemea sylva in Cornubiâ plenissima olim ferarum.—S. Rumonus faciebat sibi oratorium in sylvâ Nemæa'."

‡ Ibid. 153: "Falemutha."

* Leland's Itin. vi. 63: "Falemouth is a mere Engliche worde, and hathe the name," not "of many mouthes of creakes that be withyn the havyn," but from its constituent river the Fal, that there empties itself into the sea. The harbour is accordingly denominated by Ptolemy,

We thus find a notice of the English title for the Cornish harbour, so early as the very tenth century. Immediately to the west and south-west of this, ranges a long way into the channel, that peninsulated ground which terminates in the Lizard. The biographer then, being an English man of Devonshire, and writing where his work was found, at Tavistock, naturally settled the position of the word for his countrymen, by referring to a place in the vicinity best known to the English, and by adopting the English name for the place. He thus intimated the word to be not far from Falmouth harbour. In that vicinity, not very near indeed, but near enough for a man writing at such a distance and to such readers †, we find two parishes dedicated to St. Rumon at present. These are Ruan Major and Ruan Minor, one formerly included in the other, but both included once in St. Kevern, both including also St. Grade and Landewednack once. For the church of St. Grade still tithes all the estates in St. Kevern, which run from the village of Gwentor to the borders of Ruan parishes westward; tithes equally one third of the barton of Erisey, and of the tenement of Trenoon, though at a considerable distance from it, though actually far within the parish of Ruan Major; and also tithes the tenement of Voge, though contiguous to the old glebe of Landewednack. The reason for all this pre-eminence in St. Grade, this sort of seigniorial royalty in that parish over the neigh-

Ptolemy, the Mouth of the Cenio; the Fal so called then, and actually having upon it the ancient town Cenia, the present Tre-goney. The Cornish name of the harbour, therefore, was in all probability Port Geney, as Tre Geney (pronounced Treg'ney) is the castle on the Cenia. "Nomen sumpsisse videtur," adds Leland, in ix. 64, in some measure correcting himself for what he had said before, "a Fala fluvio;—ego tamen aliquando audiivi quendam "contententem, nomen loco ex multis ostiis fuisse inditum," an etymon which he rejects here, though he was weak enough to adopt it before. Then Leland speaks in these equally magnificent and elegant terms of the harbour: "Utenaque sit, constat secundum hunc esse "a primo," second only to Milford Haven, "totius Britanniae portum;—collustravi Falcem sem, bone Deus, quantum ibi fidissimæ stationis, quantum recessuum, quantum divortiorum, quantum cornuum! rursus, quam quæta, quam secunda sint illic omnia! non poterat facile luisse natura majori in portu commediate."

† Camden, p. 137, does the same, though obliged to much more exactness than a biographer; "reducto ab hâc Meneg littore," he says, concerning the Lizard, "sinus— "occurrit Vale fluviolum recipiens."

bouring parishes, results from one simple circumstance, which is closely connected with my subject. Near the church of St. Grade is an estate, which is KNOWN FROM TRADITION TO HAVE BEEN THE PARTICULAR RESIDENCE OF SAINT RUMON, and is therefore denominated SAINT RUAN at present. And as the parish of Ruan Minor is merely a narrow lingula of land, between St. Grade's tenements on the opposing sides of St. Kevern and of Ruan Major parishes; so are both the Ruans, Major and Minor, denominated expressly "the church of Saint Rumon," in the Valor of pope Nicholas *. Here then, though all traces of the name have now vanished, was the Nemean wood of Cornwall, spreading all over the broad back of the peninsula, defying by its combined powers all the blasts that now sweep this region with so much violence, and affording warm shelter for beast or man in the interiors of it. Here, therefore, was the oratory of St. Rumon, within the thickets of the Nemean wood. The thickets, however, had been cleared of the wild beasts, when the biographer wrote the life of the saint; and the site exists only in part, with any of its original wildness at present. This part is Leland's "wyld moore cawled Gunhilly, i. e. Hilly Hethe; wher ys brood of "catyle †." This is a tract of land near three miles across, chiefly consisting of a loamy soil, but bearing not even copse-wood at present; on which those little horses of Cornwall used formerly to be bred ‡, the memory of whom is still preserved in the remembered appellation of Gunhilles, and close to which the church of St. Grade has a portion of its parish now §. "There is a kinde of naggs," says Norden, "bredd upon "a mountanous and spatious peece of grounde, called Goon-hillye, "lyinge betwene the sea coaste and Helston; which are the hardeste "naggs and beste of travaile for their bones within this kingdome, resembling in body for quantitie, and in goodnes of mettle, the Galloway "naggs ||." Here, near to the site of St. Grade's church, at the village still denominated St. Ruan from the fact, towards the southern extremity of the whole, and upon the leeward or eastern side of it, in a position much nearer to the sun than any other region of Britain, and as

* "Ecclesia Sancti Rumoni."

† Leland's Itin. vii. 118.

‡ Borlase's Nat. Hist. 88.

§ Large map of Cornwall.

|| Norden, 20.

so sheltered by the woods to windward, very much warmer, did St. Rumon live; having a cell for his habitation, and a chapel for his devotions; regardless of the wild beasts around him, seeing them perhaps in his walks, hearing them perhaps in his prayers, yet beholding them probably to flee the face of this strange intruder on their privacies.

Even the particular position of his chapel and his cell seems to be pointed out to us by the general appellation of his forest. When we find the same sort of appellation occurring in other regions of the Celtic language; we know our own to be equally Celtic with theirs. When we find the fountain of Nemausus in the south of France, giving name to the town of Nemausus, or Nîmes, there; a river in another part of France, discharging itself mediately into the Moselle, under the title of Nemesa, or *Nyms; and a fountain of Spain, bearing in Martial the very title of our Cornish forest, Nemea†; we see our title, like that of Nîmes, derived solely from a fountain. Then we irresistibly refer this fountain to the hermitage of St. Rumon, sensible from all that we have previously learnt, of the attractiveness of a fountain to a hermit, and of a hermit's settlement being always at a fountain. And we accordingly see these circumstances combining with each other, with the notices which I have given before, and with one or two that I shall give immediately hereafter, in the present case. About a quarter of a mile to the north-east of Grade church, is a noted well, from which is fetched all the water used in baptism at the church. It has also a saint and a hermit belonging to it, being denominated St. Grade's well; this "Sancta "Grada, alias Grade‡," settling at it in some later period, when the parishes of Ruan Major and Minor had been both laid out in one, so superseding the name of Rumon at it, and even occasioning a new parish to be formed out of fragments of both, with Landewednack as a

* D'Anville in Notice Ancienne de la Gaule, 479: "Dans le poëme d'Ansone sur la Moselle, Nemesa et Pronea sont deux rivières qui grossissent celle de Sura; et en-effet Nyms réunie à la rivière de Prum, est reçue par la rivière de Sour, qui se rend dans la Moselle."

† Martial, i. 50.

‡ So called in Henry's Valor, chapelry afterwards to it, now equally a parish-church itself. But it proves its own relationship to St. Rumon, by lying very near to Saint Ruon village, close on the left of the road, at the head of a little hill, and fronting the village. It is walled up at the back and sides with dense black iron-stones; but the front, and particularly the arched entrance, is composed of coarse granite. The water is very fine and pellucid, exactly answering therefore to Ausonius's description of the fountain at Nismes,

. Vitreâ non luce Nemausus Purior.

The water too, which is always up to the brim of the basin, is remarkably cold in summer; and thus answers exactly again to Martial's description of his fountain in Spain;

Avidam rigens Dercenna placabit sitim, Et Nemea quæ vincit nives.

So faithfully represented do we discern the Nemausus and the Nemea of the continent, in the Nemea of our own Cornwall! And so judiciously had our St. Rumon selected the waters of this fountain for his own beverage! His hermitage, however, was not immediately upon the brink of it, but in what is now the village, pleasantly situated upon a little hill, like the well, and distant about a stone's throw, or rather more, from it. The village consists only of about half a dozen houses, all mean, except one on the right hand, just as you ascend the hill. This has a ruinous fence before it, denominated the court-wall, and built with iron-stones, enormously large. The house itself was nearly all in ruins about forty years ago, was therefore rebuilt, but had originally windows and a doorway, all arched like the well. Some of the moorstones that composed the doorway and windows, are still upon the ground; while the other stones are like those of the court-wall, iron-stones enormously large. Here then we have the very hermitage of St. Rumon; afterwards converted into a chapel, like St. Mawe's; but latterly, though built of materials so strong and so massy, sinking under the weight of its own antiquity, and crumbling into ruins §.

Hence,

§ Naim, Neimh (I.), brightness; Neimhin (I.), Niamhain (I.), to shine or be bright; Neimheach (I.), glittering or shining; Neamhain (I.), a pearl; Neamhonn (I.), a diamond; and

Hence, however, St. Rumon must have been taken with that holy kind of violence, which we, in the predominance of worldly wisdom, are apt to consider as merely ceremonial, but which must have been real in such a sanctified hermit as this; in order to be made a bishop. That he was a bishop, Malmesbury decisively shews us. But he soon probably returned from his palace of St. German's, and resettled in his hermitage at St. Ruan; because his biographer takes no notice of his exaltation. From nature and from habit, his relish probably was too strong for a life of retirement, for the energies of vocal prayer, and for the ecstasies of mental devotion; to bear the interruptions of business, to suffer the intrusions of company, and to endure the impertinences of conversation. Nor let the modern world smile at this, in its bustling activities after nothing; while the ancient knew well the respect that was justly due to it. He certainly died at his cell, was buried in his oratory, and then became sainted by the reverence of the country adjoining. His oratory thus expanded into a church at some distance, his wood was formed into a parish, and the wild beasts were dislodged to make room for human inhabitants. Yet his relics were preserved with religious attention at his own hermitage-chapel, and his name was affixed with religious veneration to it. The place took the name of St. Ruan, as the parish-church took the equal appellation of Ruan. But when "Ordulph, duke of Cornwall" and Devonshire, under the Saxon sovereigns, in 961, erected a monastery at Tavistock; he was so struck with their reverence for Rumon's name, Rumon's relics, and Rumon's memory; that he took up the bones of the saint, and transferred them to his new monastery*. There the saint was buried in pomp, with the ensigns of his episcopal dignity upon his monument, and with the tra-and Neamh (I.), heaven, with its derivatives Neamhach (I.), a heavenly spirit; Naomh (I.), a saint; Naomha (I.), holy; Neimheadh (I.), glebe-land. The radical idea, therefore, is brightness, and this has gradually shot out into glebe-land. I have traced the ramifications to shew the necessity of digging down to the very root in these inquiries, and to produce an etymon coinciding with all the names. Goes Naimh, Neimh, or Neimheadh (I.), would signify the Wood of the Bright Fountain.

* Leland's Coll. iv. 153: "Ordulphus, dux Cornubie, transtulit e ad Ramonem Taver-
" stochiam."

dition of his saintship attached to it. There, as William of Worcester additionally informs us, "Saint Ramon, a bishop, an Irishman, lies in a "shrine within the abbey-church of Tavystoke, between the quire and "St. Mary's chapel †." And there also his life was written, from such memorials as then remained of him at St. Ruan, after a lapse of years so great, that his biographer says his wood was FORMERLY very full of wild beasts, and thus uses a language which throws us back two or three hundred years in time, even nearly to the commencement of our Cornish sec. Thus should Rumon come in, one of the very first bishops of Cornwall, and long prior to any of the Saxon prelates ‡.

But let us try if we cannot reduce the chronology into a shorter compass, by the pressure of some incidents preceding.—We have seen the parish of Gerens laid out about the year 650, and the church of it taking the name of a religious king, who died in the district under the year 596 *. We have also seen the parish of Philley, laid out about the same year §. The latter, however, we have observed to have been originally a member of another parish, Ruan Lanyhorne adjoining; and this was therefore prior to that, as the parent to the child. Yet it was but just prior, I believe. Originally itself a part of the parish of Veryan, that mighty polypus from which have been produced so many successively, by the mere act of abscission; as is plain to the examining mind from several circumstances, the ex-

† W. de Worcestre, 105: "Informacio Thomæ Peperelle de Tavystoke, notarii publici: "Sanetus Ramonus episcopus, Hiberniæ, jacet in scrinio, in ecclesiâ abbathiæ de Tavystoke, inter chorum et capellam Beatæ Mariæ."

‡ In Butler's Lives of the Saints, translated into French by abbé Godescard, and published in twelve tomes octavo, at Paris, 1783-1788, is this strange account of "Saint "Rumon, évêque. On ne connoit point le siege, qu'a occupé ce saint. On n'en sait pas "davantage sur le detail de sa conduite, parce que sa vie a été perdue durant la fureur des "guerres. Quoiqu'il en soit, son culte est fort ancien à Tavistock, en Devonshire, où le "comte Ordulf lui bâtit une eglise en 960. Son nom est marqué au 4 Janvier, dans la "second edition du Martyrologe de Wilson, qui avoit été instruit par ceux du pays de ce qui "concernoit le saint." (i. 83.) So ignorant do these martyrologists and biographers appear, concerning their own saints!

* See iv. 4, preceding.

§ See v. 1, preceding.

tension of Veryan upon two sides of it, the separation of Veryan from it by merely two lanes in general, the interposition of Veryan in a narrow tongue of land betwixt it and Tregoney, even the actual incorporation of Veryan into one manor with it to the present moment; it became emancipated, when he who held Veryan under the king, retired from the immediate vicinity of the king at Gwendraith there, and transferred his manor-house from the church-town of Veryan to that of Ruan Lanyhorne. The whole royalty is now denominated the manor of Elerky and Ruan Lanyhorne conjointly, and the primary site of the house is still known by the appellation of Elerky. From this site the lord removed to the northern extremity of the parish, at some distance from Gwendraith and the sea, yet upon a tide-rivulet, and along its bank sloping sharply to the mid-day sun. On this position he built himself a house, regularly castellated in itself, provided with a dungeon for his manerial prison, and just resigned up to destruction when Leland came to visit it; he saying, concerning the rivulet, that “at the head of this “creeke standith the castelle of Lanyhorne, sumtyme a castel of an $\frac{1}{2}$ “tourres, now decaying for lak of coverture $\frac{1}{4}$.” Some considerable ruins of it even yet remain, though the village has been all constructed of its stones. But the church was coæval with the castle, the lord, in a just reverence for the rites of religion, erecting a church, and stationing a clergyman by the side of his castle, just as he had then by his manor-house at Veryan, for the spiritual emolument of himself and his household; procuring a portion of the old parish to be sequestered from it for a new one, procuring the tithes of this portion to be appropriated to a new rector, and liberally bestowing a large compass of land upon him for a glebe. The church being called Lan-y-horne, or the church at the angle, from its position upon a triangular piece of ground, that comes prominent in a point on the south-west, and looks down from an elevation of seven or eight feet upon the personage-house with its appendages, lying reclined on the immediate margin of the creek §; it has

† Itin. iii. 29.

§ Lan-heru, the name of the manor-house in Mangan parish, near St. Columb, and once the name of the parish itself (Carew, 63), like our own Larthorne, is derived, like our own, from the singular form of the ground, upon which the church certainly stands.

has caused this to be denominated Lanyhorne pill, or creek; the house to be entitled (as we have seen) Lanyhorne castle, and the district, all nameless before, to be denominated Lanyhorne parish *. Such a dominion had the ideas of a church, as the temple of God and the house of his worship, over the fancy and the language of the Cornish populace then! Thus we find the church noticed in the Valor of 1292, as “ecclesia de Lanihorn ;” immediately after the mention of “ecclesia “ de Elerky.” But Rumon, the bishop of Cornwall and the hermit of Nemea, being sainted; his name was fixed upon it, and the Lan-y-horn was dedicated to Saint Ruan. Then the two names contended for pre-eminence through several ages, here as well as at Veryan; the saintly endeavouring to rank with the seignioral, and even to supersede it. From a principle of religious reverence for the memory of the saint, his name became popular in conversation for that of the parish; while the other was retained in all formal writings, out of a proper adherence to ancient and original appellations. But the popular name was sure to prevail at last, from the continual recurrence of it in conversation. Accordingly we find the title of Elerky completely sunk in conversation at present, for that of Veryan. Yet the daughter-parish seems to have maintained the contest with greater firmness than the mother. Lanyhorne and Ruan went on for a long time, as equal claimants for the right of denominating the parish; but the latter was plainly gaining ground upon the former. The

So Linkinhorne, Lankinghorne in the last Valor, Lankenhorn in the first; Polkanhorne, a personal name in Cornwall; Treganhorn, a house so called in Cornwall; all signify in the last syllable what Cornu does in Latin, and what Kornel (W.), Cornat, Coinal (C.), Korn (A.), or Kearn (I.), do, a corner. And that Corn (C.) was occasionally pronounced as its derivative Horn in English, is plain from the personal and local appellations above, the very personal being originally local, and from the appearance of the word Sorn (C.), a corner, being merely Horn with the sibilating prefix to it. So Castle Hornick in Cornwall means, not the Iron Castle surely, as Pryce and Borlase and Tonkin unite to interpret it, but, as common sense suggests in opposition to them all, the Castle in a Corner.

* Leland's Itin. iii. 29: “From Lanyhorne Pille,” not “Pyle” for castle, as Burton reads the word, but Pil (C.), a creek; as we have, p. 28, “Lanyhorne Creeke or Hille,” Pille, p. 29, “Lanyhorne Pille,” and “S. Juste Pille, or Creeke.” We have even at this day, and upon this river, the Fal, a creek running by the church of Feoock, and denominated Pil.

parish

parish is called in the last Valor “Ruon or Lanyhorne,” the seignioral and sainted names here standing upon the same ground, but the sainted taking precedence of the seignioral †. The lord’s copse in the parish is at this day called Lanyhorne Wood, while the rector’s is called Ruan Wood. In this partition of the parish between the two rivals, an even balance of power was set up; but could not be long maintained, when the sainted name was supported on the shoulders of the many, and the seignioral was only “upheld by old repute.” Yet it was maintained more equally than we should expect; the formal title of the parish being Ruan Lanyhorne at present; Ruan as the presiding half of the name, but Lanyhorne as not extinguished like Elerky; while, in that predominance of spirit which originally created the contest, which made Lanyhorne, like Pompey, object to an equal, and Ruan, like Cæsar, revolt against a superior, Cæsar’s cause has finally prevailed, and Ruan is the only name in all the country round. Thus does it bear triumphantly upon its brow, the signature of its relation to St. Rumon; a relation begun when it began itself, commencing therefore in the seventh century, with Philley and with Gerens, yet commencing some time before them, even much nearer to the erection of the Cornish episcopate, about 614, and shewing St. Rumon to have been, in all probability, the very first bishop that ever presided over it *.

The

† Not as published by Bacon, where the name is merely “Ruon Lanyhorne,” but, as the receivers of the tenths direct the rector to pay them specifically for “Ruon or Lanyhorne.”

* St. Rumon became so famous at Tavistock, that Henry I. granted to Tavistock, “nuncias ad festum Sancti Rumoni per tres dies” (Monasticon, i. 219 and 1000), a fair still kept on the ninth of September, as the feast of Ruan Lanyhorne is accordingly on the second Sunday in September; that William Rufus confirmed to the abbey an estate “per cultellum elur-neum,” so old is the ivory knife among us! “quod in manu tenuit et abbati porrexit,” and “qui quidem cultellus jacet in feretro Sancti Rumoni” (p. 997); that so early as 1193, the church, which was dedicated to the Virgin Mary alone (p. 996), had associated St. Rumon with her in the patronage of itself, “in honore Beatæ Mariæ et Sancti Rumoni confessoris” (p. 998); that, though the church at times retained the Virgin Mary for its patron to the last (p. 997, 999, 1003), yet at times also it did not, and Rumon even superseded the Virgin herself, a donation of land “abbati monasterii Sancti Rumoni de Tavistock,” being dated the 26th of Edward III. (p. 1001, 1002); and that once Richard de Wiche

The Saxon sovereigns, on the reduction of Cornwall in 936, very naturally nominated Cornish clergymen to be bishops of St. German's, in order to conciliate the minds of their new subjects, and to conceal half of their subjection from them. This principle, however, would operate only at first; and Saxons would then be appointed to this, as well as to every other see of the Saxons. A religious respect for the difference of language in Cornwall, should certainly have come in as a powerful auxiliary to policy, and as a principle of action much more dignified in itself; to continue Cornishmen in the throne of St. German's, as educated in the language of the country, as familiar with the manners of the natives, as therefore most competent to discharge their high duties towards both. But the interests of religion are seldom suffered to mingle with, and seldomer to oppose themselves against, the advantages of policy, either in private or in public persons; and the prelates of Cornwall, however Cornish at first, were certainly Saxon afterwards. The first who sat under the patronage of England, even Conan, was evidently a Cornishman; the name being apparently Cornish in itself. This prelate seems to have been a hermit before he was a bishop, like Rumon; and in that parish of Roche too, where his memory is still revered, his name is still fixed upon the church, and his well, his meadow, with his park, are still recognised to this day. He was assuredly the original hermit of that very rock, which from him has so long lent its appellation to the parish; to which perhaps he retired occasionally from his house at Trefrank, for a stricter sequestration, a more rigorous solitude, during the season of Lent; and from which his name of Conan has been nearly lost in the descriptive title of Wiehe is noticed in a confirmation made by Bartholomew bishop of Exeter, to have granted some tithes to¹ the monastery, "et hanc donationem super altare Beati Rumoni Tavistochie," as now the high altar of the church, "per librum Evangeliorum manu propria obtulisse" (p. 1002). But the immediate connexion between the parish of Ruan Lanyhorne and the abbey of Tavistock, through the medium of St. Rumon, is strongly marked by this incident. "The castle of Lanyhorne," says Leland, iii. 29, "—longid as principal house to the archedecon's;" and one of these, "Dominus Odo le arcedekne miles," in the 17th of Edward I. gave an estate in Devonshire, "Beate Mariæ et Sancto Rumono et abbati de Tavistock." (Monasticon, p. 997.)

Saint

Saint Roche, or the Holy Man of the Rock. From this hermitage he was removed to the throne of St. German's, the Saxon king imitating the Cornish in his nomination of a hermit for his first prelate; and on his death, canonized by the partial veneration of his countrymen. But his name remains a family-name in Cornwall to this day; Conan being only varied into Conon, or lengthened out into Conant, as it is now written; or even vitiated into Gonnet, as it is now pronounced at Roche*. Thus Rumon is equally a family-name in Cornwall still, with

* Tonkin's MS.: "This parish is dedicated to St. Roche—. It is named De Rupe in "Taxat. Ben. 1291, from its remarkable rock," rather from its Saint of the Rock; De Rupe in the Valor being the name, not of the parish but of the church; and "ecclesia de Rupe," as the appellation of the Valor really is, meaning just as "ecclesia de Anton," or "ecclesia de Maere," or "ecclesia de Keyne," the church of the saint, St. Roche's church. It "was then dedicated to St. Conant, whose memory is still preserved by his well "on Trefrank, his park and meadow, corruptly called St. Gonnet's." Mr. Tonkin was peculiarly fortunate in catching these traditions at the very moments of their flight. They are now all gone, except "St. Gonnet's park," as called, a field about an acre in extent, a stone's throw from the rock, and to the west of it. But what is considered as the hermitage on the rock, is merely a chapel erected on the site of the hermitage at his death, and re-erected so little a time before the Reformation, as to carry an aspect too modern surely to be mistaken, as I have known it mistaken, for a British antiquity, by any who will use their senses in contradiction to their opinions. Antiquaries coming into Cornwall to view its remains, come with their minds all disordered by the expectation of druidical monuments, and—find these in every relique of antiquity.—We thus discover, and in the very name of a parish, a word utterly lost to the Cornish language, and retained only in the Bretoon, Roche, a rock: "Ce mot," says Pelletier, "se trouve dans les anciens livres, et dans l'usage d'aujourd'hui." So we have Roche in French, Rochelle, Rochfort, in France, and Roche Alley, famous for its stone, in Yorkshire.—The well on Trefrank, colloquially called Tre-rank, is at a little distance from the rock; and the estate seems to have taken its name from some exemption granted to it, as we have a green by the ancient site of the lord's house at Veryan, on which a fair is traditionally reported to have been held formerly, denominated Toll-frank Green. The hermitage is so entire at one end, that we may discern its whole form perfectly. From two windows there, and a pediment projecting midway between them, we see the whole consisted of two stories and two rooms; the upper, from its large and ornamented window, appearing to have been the chapel; but the lower, with its petty window, the abode of the chaplain, almost as much a hermit as St. Roche himself. The lower is the room into which the ascent leads, and leads by steps formed in the rock; but led, till these very few years, by a ladder brought occasionally for the purpose, as the rock then formed an abrupt precipice.

the

the pronunciation of it into Roman *; and seems from the parish denominated Romansleigh in Devonshire, as dedicated to him, to have been so pronounced by the English. But the Cornish, using that elision which I have formerly noted in the letter n among the Britons, which they extended equally to the kindred letter m, and of which the same signature still remains for both among us, in the omission of the letters upon paper, and in a stroke over them to note the omission; Rumon was abbreviated, as we have seen, into Ruon, or Ruan. So Rhufain is Welsh for Rome at present, but must originally have been for Romans, as Rhufeiniaid is for Romans; Rhufon, Ruon, the proper name of a man (says Davies), but a soldier (adds Lhuyd), and both, however contradictorily, yet very justly, I believe, as the word is really Rhufon, a Roman, thence settled naturally into the personal appellation of a man, and as naturally diverted to signify a soldier; as we have it meaning again, in Rhyon (Welsh) a soldier, and in Rhun (Welsh) the proper name of a man, the name particularly of a Welsh king up in the sixth century †. In Cornwall we have Reve and Ruan for Rome, Revenuer and Rouan for a Roman ‡. Accordingly we find Rumon to be denominated Roman expressly, not merely in the English Romansleigh of Devonshire, but in an intimation of his burial at St. Ruan, by one of Leland's English authors §.

Such were two of the British bishops of Cornwall, one antecedent by three centuries to the Saxon reduction of the country, and one cotemporary with it. To these we are inclined to add the Stidio of the false

* Carew, 63: "John Roman." It is also a name at Tregoney still.

† Richards, the Welsh Bible, and Rowlands's Mona Antiqua, 148.

‡ Pryce and Borlase. In Carew, 39, a record 3 Henry IV. gives us "Polraman" in Lynewith hundred, and upon the northern coast; the same appellation, assuredly, with "Pol-ruan" on the southern.

§ Leland's Coll. iv. 81: "Sanctus—Romanus episcopus, in loco [sepelitur] qui dicitur "Aeyesty-calum [at West-Wealum], prope brachium maris quod vocatur Hegesmundæ " [Hegel-mutha]," near that arm of the sea which is called Hele or Helford river; just as the Hayle of St. Ives is denominated Hegel-mithe, by Malmesbury, 146. In Leland's Itin. viii. 15, we have "Johan. Romanus" archbishop of York.

list, as a third; because his name seems too romanized to be Saxon, to lengthen out in the Roman mode from Stidio into Stidionis, and in this form to be fixed upon the church of St. Stedian, alias St. Stythyan, within our deanery of Kerrier. Yet on full examination we cannot admit it; nor can the list receive any support from a coincidence so apposite, and an analogy so inviting. The church of Stythyan is denominated from a female saint, and is therefore called in the Valor of pope Nicholas “the church of Sancta Stediana*.” Conan was the last Briton, I believe, who ever sate in the episcopal throne at St. German’s. The rest were all Saxons. So early as the year 966, only thirty years after the nomination of Conan to the throne, we find Athelstan to be seated in it, and we know him to be a Saxon by his name†. In 994 we find Ealdred to be equally a bishop, and know him equally by his name to be a Saxon‡. But we shall soon find another bishop, under the varying name of Brightwold, Brithwold, Burgald, or Burwald; evidenced to be a Saxon by all the variations, and standing the very last of all our bishops of St. German’s§.

So apparently Saxon as all these were, let us retrace our steps, and go back in our quest for Britons. Then we shall find some who were Britons equally with Conan or Rumon, and were taken too, like them, from a hermitage. That such men as hermits should be coveted for prelates, should be allured from their cells, should even be forced out into active life; seems very natural to a period, in which goodness was esteemed superior to learning, the flame of the heart to the light of the head, a fervent spirit of devotion to adroitness in the management of business, and the graces of an angel to the virtues of a mere man. The passions of the public then gravitated generally to religion, as their common centre. Both king and people there found a reverence for the clergy, as the official saints of God; and there felt a veneration for the

* “Ecclesia Stæ. Stedianæ.”

† Ingulphus, 502.

‡ Monasticon, i. 227: “Episcopium Ealdredi episcopi, id est in provinciâ Cornubiæ.”

§ See next chapter, sect. i.

bishops, as the sancti sanctorum of the clergy. But now opinions are so changed, that to be a saint would never draw down a mitre upon the head of a clergyman, to be a hermit would disqualify entirely for the management of a diocese, and learning alone is the ostensible recommendation to a bishopric; even when our government is not compelled, as too frequently it is, from its inability of resting firmly upon its own foundations of power, from its finding principle not sufficiently operative in favour of allegiance, to higgler and huckster even with bishoprics for its own support.

Thus we see in the calendars of our Cornish saints, that SAINT PIRAN, who came out of Ireland a mere saint, was, as a saint, exalted into a bishop in Cornwall; he being entitled in one of them "Saint "Pieram, bishop," and in another, "Saint Pyram, bishop of Cornwall *." We find also that SAINT GERMOCH, who came from Ireland with Breaca, and was then a king, became equally a bishop afterwards; his name being thus recited, with the supersedence of the royal by the episcopal title, "Saint Gyermoch, bishop, his day is kept on the day of "St. John in the holydays of the Nativity, at three miles from Mount "St. Michael †." In the same calendars we meet with a third prelate of Cornwall, in a third hermit from Ireland; SAINT CARANTOC being expressly recorded there, as "bishop and confessor," and his day noted as "the 16th of May, under the letter C ‡." And we find even a fourth of these sainted refugees from Ireland, SAINT ERGHE, made a bishop; as "St. Herygh, brother of St. Vuy [Vny]," bears the title of "bishop," like Rumon; but, like Rumon, has his remains removed out of Cornwall, as "he lies in a certain church under the cross of St.

* W. de Worcestre, p. 107: "In libro kalendarii principalis libri Antiphaner [Antiphoner.] ecclesiæ Thomæ, prioris canonicorum de Bodman, inveni scriptum de bonâ manu, 'Sanctus Pieramus, episcopus'." P. 134, 135: "In ecclesiâ de Lancelton.—" "Sanctus Pyramus, episcopus de Cornubiâ'." See also v. 1, before.

† Ibid. 107: "Sanctus Gyermochus, episcopus; dies ejus agitur die Sancti Johannis in festo natalis, per tria millia de Monte Sancti Michaelis." See iv. 7, before.

‡ Ibid. 108: "Sanctus Karantocus, episcopus et confessor, 16 die Maii, C littera." See v. 1, before.

“ Paul’s at London ||.” These, however, being prior to the erection of a Cornish see, could only have acted in their episcopal office, as suffragans to the prelate of Exeter; and being many of them cotemporaries with each other, as suffragans co-ordinate in different parts of Cornwall at the same time. These, therefore, were never seated on the stone-chair of St. German’s; that Lias Fail of our Cornwall, upon which the spiritual sovereigns of it had immemorially used to be enthroned: yet they were prelates of Cornwall, and let us search for more of them.

By the same sort of light, not very strong indeed, but serving happily to soften the darkness, and hitherto unused for this purpose, we can just discern the persons of some more of our British bishops. They have hitherto lain buried in the darkness of their graves, the vaults being closed over their heads, and no memorials appearing to the inquisitive eye above; but we are now fortunate enough to find their vaults, and bold enough to break them open; yet advance into the dropping damp, and invade the awful stillness, listening with fear to the very echo of our foot-fall, and holding our little lamp before us with a tremulous hand. In that calendar of the church of Tavistock, which has particularly preserved the name and title of St. Rumon, are equally preserved those of another saint; “SAINT ELIDIUS” being there denominated “a bishop,” his day being said to be “the eighth of August,” and his remains being stated to “lie in the isle of Sylley*.” The same saint, under the same appellation, a little varied into “Seynt Lyda,” is declared from the trumpet of tradition at the place, always sounded in the legend of the saint at the church, to have been “the son of a king,” and probably of an Irish king, though our extract from the legend has here a lacuna in it†. He lived a saint in what was denominated from him St. Lyde’s Isle, contractedly for St. Elid’s, and viciously by English pronunciation since, St. Helen's †; was there called upon to be the prelate of the province of the isles, was there buried also, and there had his memory revered with great devoutness for ages afterward. "Saynet Lide's Isle" is noted by Leland as a place, "wher in tymes past at her sepulchre," Leland strangely mistaking the sex of the saint, "was gret superstitioun §:" veneration for a saint and a bishop in one who was born the son of a king, yet made himself a mere hermit in a lonely islet, having perhaps risen in a tremblingly aspiring flame of devoutness into superstition; but the superstition probably being quite harmless in itself, and this surely being infinitely superior to the contemptuous neglect which has succeeded it.

|| Worcestre, 106: “Sanctus Herygh, frater Sancti Vuy [Vny], episcopus, jacet in quâdam ecclesiâ scitâ sub cruce ecclesiæ Sancti Pauli Londoniarum.” See v. 1, before.

* Ibid. 115: “In kalendario ecclesiæ monasterii Tavistoke. . . . Sancti Elidii, episcopi, 8 die Augusti; jacet in insulâ Sullys’.”

† Ibid. 98: “Insula Seynt Lyda (fuit filius regis).”

We then come to another bishop in the vault, embalmed as he lies within his cere-cloth; but must stop a longer time in reading his inscription and in surveying his features, to distinguish the bishop from two saints on the right and left of him. "Saint Mybbard, a hermit," cries William of Worcester, from oral information at the parish hereafter mentioned, "was the son of a king of Ireland, and was otherwise "denominated Colrogus; his body lies in a shrine at the church of Kardynan, two miles from Bodman, and his day is held on the "Thursday before the feast of Pentecost*."—"St. Mancus, his companion," and equally "a hermit, lies in the parish of Lanteglas," near Fowey; "but the village is called Bodeknek," Bodinnick, "in the "same parish; and his feast," like St. Mybbard's, "is held on the "Thursday before the feast of Pentecost †."—"St. Wyllow, a hermit,

† Dr. Borlase, in his Sylley Isles, p. 50, has observed this; adding with equal justness, that in the Monasticon, i. 998, 1002, the isle is called "Insula Sancti Elidii."

§ Itin. iii. 19. The name being written St. Lyda, as it is written by William above, Leland was led to suppose the bishop a woman.

* Worcester, 141: "Sanctus Mybbard heremita, filius regis Hiberniæ, aliter dictus Colrogus; ejus corpus jacet in scrinio ecclesiæ de Kardynan, distat per duo milliaria de Bodman—, et ejus dies agitur die Jovis, proximâ ante festum Pentecostes."

† Ibid. ibid.: "Sanctus Mancus, consodalis ejus, heremita, jacet in parochiâ de Lanteglas; at villa vocata Bodeknek est in dictâ parochiâ, et ejus festum agitur die Jovis proximâ ante festum Pentecostes."

“ was an associate with St. Mancus and St. Mydbard, and his feast is “ kept,” like that of both, “ on the Thursday next before the feast of “ Pentecost; and he himself lies in the parish of Alleretew,” Lanreythowe or Lanreth, “ about a mile from Bodennek†.” But of these three saints, so signally commemorated upon one day in all their three parishes, which is the prelate, and which the mere saint of Cornwall? They are all three assuredly Irish, one of them being expressly recorded as “ the son of a king of Ireland,” and the other two being merely his attendants or companions in his sequestration, though they kept much nearer to each other than to him. One of these two was the prelate, as William additionally informs us in a distant passage of his work. “ SAINT MANCUS,” he there says, “ was a bishop, and lies in the “ church of Lanretho, near the town of Fowey, within two miles “ from it §.”

I have thus disclosed to my reader's eye British bishops of Cornwall, no less than six in number; yet to all I can add two more. “ SAINT “ BARNIC [Barrie] a bishop, in English called St. Barre, is buried in the “ church of Fowey, and his feast is three days next before the feast of “ St. Michael ¶.” At Fowey he is accordingly recognised for the patron saint at present, the church being now dedicated to him as St. Fim-barrus; and “ the paroch church of Fowey,” says Leland accordingly, “ is “ of S. Fim-barrus ¶.” He was thus denominated, as two confessed

† Woreestre, 141: “ Sanctus Wyllow heremita fuit consocius Sancti Mancii et Sancti “ Mydbard, et ejus festum tenetur die Jovis proximâ ante festum Pentecosten, et ipse jacet “ in parochiâ Alleretew per unum milliare de Bodenneck.”

§ Ibid. 115: “ Sanctus Mancus, episcopus, jacet in ecclesiâ Lanretho, prope villam de “ Fowey, infra duo milliaria.” The licentious use of the word “infra” here, for “intra,” is common to all old charters, &c. and continued to be used in charters, &c. till the middle of the seventeenth century. The name of Mancus has been superseded in the appellation of his own church, by some saint (I know not whom) of the name of Lanty; and Lanteglos signifies the church of Lanty.

¶ Ibid. 113: “ Sanctus Barnic, episcopus, callid Anglicè Seynt Barre, sepelitur in “ ecclesiâ de Fowey; et ejus festum per tres dies proximè ante festum Sancti Michaelis.”

¶ Itin. iii. 33.

saints of Ireland were, Barrus, Barrocius, Finian, or Find-barrus*; was equally Irish himself with both, therefore, and was so denominated undoubtedly, as we are assured that one of those Irish saints was from his fine head of hair†. His original appellation thus appears to have been what the tradition of Fowey has carefully transmitted to us, Fimbarrus, and the others are only abbreviations of it; Fim, in Irish, being the same word as fine in English, while Bar signifies the hair of the head. But let us now proceed to the other in our catalogue of bishops. "SAINT HYLDREN," says our very useful memorialist, from monuments then very accessible and obvious, but soon whirled away by a tornado of reformation, "a bishop, lies in the parish of Lansalux," Lansallocs, alias Lansalwys, "near the parish of Launteglys: his feast is held on "the first day of February, that is, on the vigil of the Purification of "the Blessed Mary‡." So many saints and bishops have we now discovered in this little, insulated, unfrequented angle of Cornwall, at the mouth of the river Fowey, and within the compass only of three parishes! There may the Cornish antiquary, now, for the first time, with equal curiosity and admiration,

The land of heroes and of saints survey.

Yet I can add one more to my beadroll of bishops. I find this one, however, in an incidental notice upon a monastic record; there I perceived him from a mere casualty in reading, or (to speak more properly perhaps) from a spirit always on the wing, in exploring every corner, and examining every nook of probable, almost of possible, information for my purpose. Among the numerous relics once preserved with serious solicitude at Glastonbury, now dissipated with the unfeeling temerity of ignorance, even yet considered with a smile of supercilious pity by the vulgar many, but high objects surely of reverence to the religious, and of taste to the historical, among the learned, was the crown of a skull once belonging to “Saint CONOGLASUS, a prelate of Cornwall §.” This appellation is so nearly the very same with that of a British king cotemporary with Gildas, and addressed by him ||, that we cannot but believe the bishop to have been equally British with the king. Nor does the appellation signify what Gildas, in a just indignation at the profligate king, but in a violent distortion of the word from the meaning, a distortion so violent that we cannot trace the mode of making it, intimates it to signify—the Yellow-haired Butcher ¶. It means merely the pale (or the white) lord; Cún being still a lord in Welsh, and “Conn of the hundred battles” being still celebrated as a hero in the old annals of Ireland, while Glas denotes only the colour of either the complexion or the hair *.

* Usher, 493, 494: at Clonard, "Adamuano Sanctus Finnio, Findbarrus, et Vinnianus "dictus;" 503, "S. Barri (qui et Lochanus et Barrocius et, communi cum Finiano Clun- "darnensi nomine, Find-barrus dictus est) in Coreagiensi ecclesiâ discipuli."

† Leland's Itin. iii. 196: "Ex Virâ S. Fimbarri. 'Fimbarrus in Durconensi natus "oppido.—Fimbarrus in baptismo Joannes dictus. Postea a pulchritudine capillorum Fim- "barrus dictus.—Fimbarrus Albaniam petiit.—Fimbarrus in Hiberniam rediens, fit epis- "copus Corcagensis'." He is therefore the bishop noticed by Usher as at Cork, and not the bishop who was patron-saint of Fowey. Gwynn (W.) is white, Fionn (I.) is either white or fine, and the biographer here determines it to mean the latter only.

‡ Worcestre, 114: "Sanctus Hyldren, episcopus, jacet in parochiâ Lansalux juxta "parochiam Launteglys; ejus festum agitur primo die Februarii, id est, vigiliæ Purificationis "Beatæ Mariæ." This saint is not the same that has lent his appellation to the chapel of Lanhydrock, in the deanery of Trigge Minor; the patron-saint of this being St. Hydrock, who was no bishop, and is merely mentioned thus by Worcestre, 108: "Sanctus Hydrocius, "confessor, die 5 Maii, F littera."

Here I roll up my opened record of Cornish prelates; the record has hitherto been almost as much unopened as the roll of destiny itself. I have ventured, however, and with no ill-omened hand, I hope, to expand it all before my reader; I have thus produced a long list of prelates, all hitherto buried in the happy obscurity of their lives; as men,

§ Joannes Glastoniensis, 449: “De coronâ Sancti Conoglasii, episcopi Cornubiæ.”

|| Epistola Gildæ, 19, Gale: “Cuneglese.”

¶ Ibid. ibid.: “Romanâ linguâ, Lanio Fulve.”

* From some strange laxity in the old language of Britain, like that strange laxity in vision which is ascribed to the ducal Spencers of our country, in not discriminating kindred colours: Glas in Welsh, Cornish, and Irish, is either green, pale, blue, or gray; yet it never signifies yellow, and cannot possibly therefore signify a deep yellow, as Gildas interprets it “fulvus.” This then combines with the absolute want of any word like Con or Cun for a “Lanio” or butcher, to shew us how deviously Gildas has interpreted the name.

not blazing forth to the world with the portentous glare of a comet, but shining usefully like the stars in their little orbs, overlooked like the stars by the idly busy mind of man, yet remembered by HIM who uses the stars alone for his regular ministers : and all this assemblage of British bishops have I embodied from various regions of intelligence, to supply the place of those mere ghosts or shadows which have filled up the muster-roll of history so long !

CHAPTER SEVENTH.

SECTION I.

THE see of Cornwall, as I have previously suggested, commenced about the year 614: but it was now hastening to its dissolution; it actually ended before the Saxon monarchy. Just before and just after the termination of that monarchy, the tide of humoursome devoutness, which had been flowing for five ages, and settling sees in villages, began to ebb down again, and to carry back the sees into cities. Thus both the sees of Wilton and of Sherborne were transferred together to Salisbury soon after the Conquest*; as those of Crediton and St. German's were equally transferred to Exeter a little before. The principle which had planted the episcopate at St. German's ceased to operate, and the effect naturally terminated with the cause; yet the seat of the bishop was not removed from St. German's as a village, and fixed at Leskard or Lestwithiel as the capital of the province. A new principle sprung up in the mind, to give a new direction to the passions, to whirl away the Cornish episcopate into Devonshire, and to drop it at the Devonshire capital.

This dissolution of our bishopric at St. German's, however, was not a hasty stroke of death, but preceded by a kind of preparatory sickness, and foretold by some menacing symptoms of speedy mortality. That passion of avarice, which is so apt to steal over the calm unagitated breast of age, to degrade even the exalting spirit of literature, and to disgrace even the refining essence of religion in it, began the work of dissolving, by uniting the bishopric of St. German's with that of Cre-diton. "Livingus," as Malmesbury informs us, "from a monk of Winchester becoming abbot of Tavistock and bishop of Crediton, was reckoned to possess the greatest power and familiarity with king Canute—. He advanced so highly in his favour, that on the death of his uncle Brithwold, who was bishop of Cornwall, he was to unite both the bishoprics under his own authority †." But Malmesbury has mistaken the name of the king, and seduced Dr. Borlase into the same mistake; the Doctor has also misinterpreted the meaning of Malmesbury, or rather (as he is not much in the habit of consulting original authorities at this period of his history) has adopted the misinterpretation of another, and so given a false turn to the history. "After the death of Burwold," he says without one reference, "his nephew Livingus, abbot of Tavistock and bishop of Crediton, by his great interest with king Canute, prevailed so far as to unite the bishopric of St. German's to that of Crediton, A.D. 1049 ‡." This passage is pregnant with errors, and it is my business to point them out. The plan was, as we have seen in Malmesbury already, for an eventual, not an actual union; for one that was to take place when a future contingency happened. Livingus obtained only, that, "on the death of his uncle Brithwold,—he was to unite both the bishoprics:" the plan therefore was not to be executed till Brithwold was dead, and was actually defeated for some years by the long life of Brithwold. The uncle survived the nephew, and (if the king was Canute) the prelate outlived the king; but the king, in fact, was Edward the Confessor. Livingus, who had become bishop of Worcester as well as prelate of Crediton, before the accession of Edward to the throne, and had then been very instrumental in raising him to it §; however worthy of reverence as a prelate, was shamefully avaricious as a man, engaging deeply in the politics of the times; so being (as all such prelates are sure to be) with all the traces of literary, of moral, of episcopal dignity much effaced from his mind, cunningly selfish, and meanly grasping; or, in that low language of the world which has here crept into history, “a very prudent man||.” To the two bishoprics of Worcester and Crediton, which he already possessed, he wished to add a third in St. German’s: he applied to Edward for a promise of it, and the easy monarch could not refuse one to him. But death, that useful represser of the swelling eagerness of man for the trash of earth, cut short in the very midst his long project, of accumulating wealth upon wealth from the pilfered altars of God. Edward came to the throne in 1041 ¶, the promise was probably made immediately afterwards, and Livingus died himself upon the 23d of March, in 1046*. So little did “Livingus—, by his great interest with king Canute,—unite the bishopric of St. German’s to that of Crediton, A. D. 1049,” that Livingus died in 1046, and Canute ten years before!

* Malmesbury, f. 141 and 142.

† Malmesbury, f. 145: "Livingus, ex monacho Wintoniensi abbas Tavistokensis et episcopus Cridiensis, maximæ familiaritatis et potentix apud Cnutonem regem habitus est.—Eo apud eum gratiæ processit, ut defuncto avunculo suo Brithwoldo, qui erat Cornubiensis episcopus, ambos arbitrato suo uniret episcopatus."

‡ Borlase, 379; probably from Heylyn, 72.

§ Florence, 400: "Wicciorum episcopatum Livingo, Cridiatunensi antistiti, rex dedit Haraldus;" and 404, "Edwardus, annitentibus maximè comite Godwino et Wigornienſi præsule Livingo, Lundoniæ levatur in regem."

“On the death of Livingus,” adds Florence, “the pontificate of Worcester was immediately given to Aldred, and the prelacy of Crediton to Leofric, a Bretoon, and the king’s chancellor†.” The lord high chancellor of England, who was originally the archbishop of Canterbury, as the president of the king’s high court of chancery‡, who was

|| Florence, 394: “Virum prudentissimum Livingum.”

¶ Sax. Chron.

* Florence, 406: “Livingus, Wicciorum, Domnaniæ, et Cornubiæ præsul, decimo Cal. Aprilis, die Dominicâ, obiit.”

† Florence, 406: “Cujus post decessum, regis cancellario, Leofrico Britonico, mox Cridiatunensis—datus est præsulatus; et Aldredus Wicciorum episcopatum suscepit.” Florence, in his mistaken notion that Livingus was really what he calls him, “Wicciorum, Domnaniæ, et Cornubiæ præsul,” when we know he was so by designation only, says that his successor Leofric was made bishop of St. German’s as well as of Crediton, “Cridiatunensis et Cornubiensis datus est præsulatus.”

‡ See ii. 4, preceding, at the end.

still, and continued to be for ages afterward, a clergyman §, even necessarily one (let me remark), as the professed, the official keeper of the king's conscience, had many clerks or clergymen under him ||; as then the only students in civil or canon law, those universally considered institutes of equity, and held therefore what appears so ridiculous under our laical chancellors at present, many of the king's benefices in his patronage, for the promotion of those clerks ¶. Leofric was also, adds an old MS. in the Bodleian Library, "chaplain to the king;" or, as the Saxon Chronicle speaks exactly to the same purport, "this king's

§ M. Paris, 996: "Dum adhuc sæcularis et regis Ethelredi cancellarius extitisset;" that is, while he was a secular clergyman, and before he became a monastic one.

|| Sparke, 19, concerning Becket, "quingenta duos clericos cancellarius in obsequio suo habebat."

¶ The clerks in chancery, as clergymen, could not marry. This obligation was originally binding upon all the clerks; was first relaxed in favour of the clerk of the crown; was afterwards dissolved in favour of the cursitor clerks (the masters in chancery, formerly called clerks, with the master of the rolls as their principal); and was finally taken away from the only clerks remaining in subjection to it, those who are called the six clerks. "Whereas "of old time accustomed [it] hath been used in the—court" of chancery, says a law of the 14-15th of Henry VIII. "that all manner of clerks and ministers of the same court, writing "to the great seal, should be unmarried, except only the clerk of the crown; so that as well "the coursetours and other clerks, as the six clerks of the said chancery, were by the same "custom restrained from marriage;—and forasmuch as the said custom taketh no place nor "usage, but only in the office of the said six clerks, but that it is permitted and suffered—"that as well the said coursetours as the other clerks aforesaid, may and do take wives and "marry at their liberty,—and of long time have so done, without interruption or let of any "person;" the six clerks therefore, and "for that the said custom is not grounded upon "any law," petition the king for an allowance by statute to marry, have their petition actually inserted as a law in the statute-book, and by virtue of this insertion, without any form of ratification by the king or by the estates, have married ever since. There is only a provision annexed, that "by any thing in this act contained" the master of the rolls is not to be injured in his patronage of these clerkships, and is still to be attended by these clerks. We thus, too, account for that seeming singularity still retained, of the master's holding his courts and keeping his records in a chapel: he was formerly a clergyman as well as his attendants, and as well as his immediate superior of the chancery. This superior appears from his name to have equally held his court in a church, like our ecclesiastical judges, and within the chancel of it; and the master of the rolls was merely a master-clerk to those clerks the masters in chancery.

“priest* ;” the priest or chaplain of the king being naturally the keeper of the king’s conscience, and therefore chancellor to him. So much has the profession of the common law usurped upon its once as its naturally superior profession of divinity ; rising with the rising attachment of all ranks to the property of earth, standing now the most lucrative and most splendid of all our professions ; seating even a common lawyer upon the bench of equity, and thrusting even a layman into the post of keeper of the king’s conscience ! This Leofric, subjoins the old MS. “after he had received the honour of the pontificate, going over his diocese studiously preached the word of God to the people committed unto him, enlightened his clergy by his teaching, built churches not a few, and strenuously executed the other parts of his duty†.” Soon, however, “seeing both—Devonshire and Cornwall‡ to be often infested and ravaged by barbarous pirates, he began—to meditate diligently how he could transfer the episcopal chair of Crediton,” with that of St. German’s, “to the city of Exeter, where he could perform his ecclesiastical offices safely, free from the incursions of hostility§.”

Who then were the pirates which disturbed Leofric so much in his ecclesiastical offices at Crediton ? They are generally considered as Danes, I apprehend, and were certainly considered as Danes by myself when I came to explore this portion of our Cornish history. But they could not possibly be such ; the ravages of the Danes had concluded of course at the triumphant accession of a Danish king to the throne of England, in the person of Canute, under the year 1017, or at the formal

* Monasticon, i. 221 : “Capellano suo Leofrico,” and Sax. Chron. 158.

† Monasticon, i. 221 : “Accepto pontificatus honore, diocesim suam perlustrans, populo sibi commisso verbum Dei studiosè prædicabat, clericos doctrinâ informabat, ecclesias non paucas construebat, et cætera quæ officii sui erant strenuè amministrabat.”

‡ The MS. having previously given to Leofric “episcopatum Cridionensis ecclesiæ atque Cornubiensis provinciæ,” now describes him as “cernens utramque provinciam diocesis suæ, id est, Deveniam et Cornubiam,” &c.

§ Monasticon, i. 221 : “Piratarum barbaricâ infestatione sepius devastari, cœpit diligenter meditari, qualiter episcopalem cathedram Cridionensis loci ad urbem Exoniam transferre posset ;—ubi, ab hostilitatis incuria liber, tutius ecclesiastica officia disponere posset.”

establishment of amity in Oxford, under 1018, between the Danes and the Saxons for ever ||. Nor were there any other pirates at this period that could be called particularly "barbarous;" or, to speak more definitely, as the charge of "barbarity" is very vague, that could be said to have "infested and ravaged" either "Devonshire" or "Cornwall." There were only in the year 1049, which I shall soon prove to be the year immediately preceding this, and "in the month of August some Irish pirates, who in six-and-thirty vessels entered the mouth of the river "Severn,—joined Griffin king of South-Wales, did some damage by "plundering the adjacent country,—crossed the river which is denominated Wye, burnt Dean, and slew all that they found in it. Against "these, Aldred bishop of Worcester, with a few of the provincials of "Gloucester and Hereford, marched out in haste;" but were betrayed by some Welshmen whom they had amongst them, were surprised early in the morning by the pirates, and dispersed ¶. These, therefore, did not ravage either Cornwall or Devonshire; nor indeed does Leofric mean to say they did, as he refers only to those pirates who had "often "infested and ravaged" the western parts of England, and as he can thus indicate the Danes alone.

Such was the reason alleged by Leofric for wishing to transfer the see of St. German, with that of Crediton, to Exeter, and for thinking to secure them within the strong walls with which Athelstan had girt this city *. The reason appears to be a very feeble one, when we consider the sees to have continued at the villages of St. German's and Crediton through all the long, the comprehensive, the horrible devastations of the Danish wars before; while the city of Exeter, with its very girdle of walls to secure it, had been actually assaulted, actually stormed, and actually plundered, even so lately in them as the year 1003†. Nor can we account for this seemingly extravagant conduct, by supposing the present period of the Saxon history to be like a recent one in our own, in which a spirit of reformation wildly predominated over the mind, the slightest objections (such as may for ever be made to any system of government, however reformed) were eagerly caught up in the partial frenzy of the moment; and all the acknowledged, all the felt, all the vast happiness enjoyed under our present constitution was to be risked for innovations, certainly not necessary in themselves, certainly untried in their efficacy, probably dangerous in their operation. But the example of the French before us, possessed with the same rage for reformation, yet trying the bold experiment for reasons infinitely stronger than any which we could have, aiming naturally to rescue themselves from pressing evils, unable however to keep the wild gas within any bounds, seeing it break through all confinements, and feeling it at last burst out in a tornado that swept away the king with the people, the church with the Gospel, even all acknowledgment of the very providence, the very being of God before it; this happily brought us to our senses, made us behold clearly the knavery of our political projectors, and compelled us in our own defence to shrink back from experiments in which we could gain little, yet might lose all. We recalled to mind the case of that Italian, who kindly ordered these memorable words to be inscribed upon his tomb, words that should for ever be sounding in the ears of honest reformers:

|| Sax. Chron.

¶ Florence, 409: "Eodem anno [1049], mense Augusto, Hibernienses piratæ, 36 navibus ostium intrantes Sabrinæ fluminis,—cum adjutorio Griffini regis Australium Britonum, circa loca illa prædam agentes, nonnulla mala fecerunt. Dein conjunctis viribus, rex et ipsi pariter flumen quod Weage nominatur transeuntes, Dunedham incenderunt, et omnes quos ibi reperiabant perimerunt. Contra quos Wigorniensis episcopus Aldredus, et pauci de provincialibus Glavornensibus ac Herefordensibus, festinanter ascenderunt," &c.

* Malmesbury, f. 28.

I WAS WELL;

I WOULD BE BETTER;

I AM HERE*.

But no spirit like this was then afloat among us; the English mind did not then feel a more than ordinary share of sensibility; nor did the oak,

† Sax. Chron.

* See note at the end of the section.

that

that had stood all the violent hurricanes of nearly two centuries before, then shake and bow with a breeze.

There is generally some secret principle of selfishness in every public transaction that begins in a single heart, that assumes the appearance of a general reason, and thus induces others to co-operate with it. Leofric had imbibed no little of the selfishness of Livingus, and wanted to have that prelacy united with his own, which had been previously promised to be united with it for Livingus, and which Leofric thought perhaps he merited just as well as he. So he justly thought, I believe; he even deserved it better, I presume, yet did not deserve it at all. That two bishoprics should ever be incorporated together, except only when one of them is not competent to maintain the dignity of a bishop by itself, is the permanent prohibition of religion and wisdom combined; of religion solicitous to promote the best interests of man, and of wisdom providing the best means for promoting them. Leofric, however, had not elevation of mind to think this, or refinement of soul to respect it; selfishness vulgarizes the understanding, brutalizes the spirit, and sinks even the prelate into a peasant: he only held up before him a reason that betrays the purpose for which it was formed, and through the flimsiness of the texture discloses the nakedness of the figure behind it. In this disguise he applied to the king, and the king suffered himself to be deceived by it. He who had permitted Livingus to hold the bishopric of Worcester with that of Crediton, and had even promised him eventually the bishopric of St. German's in addition to both, was not likely to have much delicacy of religion restraining his consent to the project, and must certainly have had too much ductility of understanding to oppose strongly any selfishness in a bishop. He consented to the overture, and prepared to execute it: he was persuaded by Leofric to think, in opposition to all the experience of nearly two centuries past, that a cathedral could be safe only in the bosom of a walled city.

Edward accordingly resolving, as he tells us himself in his charter of the year 1050, "to consolidate the pontifical chair at the city of Exeter,
" in

“ in the monastery of the blessed Peter prince of the Apostles, which is “ situated within the walls of the same city;” he appointed Leofric, and his successors after him for ever, to be bishops there *. “ The “ Cornish diocese,” he adds, “ which had been formerly assigned to an “ episcopal throne, in memory of the blessed Germanus, and in vene“ ration of Petroc, I deliver with all the parishes—belonging to it, to “ St. Peter in the city of Exeter, to be one episcopal see, and one ponti- “ ficate, and one ecclesiastical rule, because of the fewness” of inhabitants at Crediton, St. German’s, or Bodmin, “ and the devastation of “ goods and persons which the pirates might have made in the Cornish “ and Crediton churches. For this reason it seemed good they should “ have a safer defence against the enemy in the city of Exeter †. I will “ therefore the see to be there; this is, that Cornwall with its churches,
“ and Devonshire with its, be together in one episcopate, and be governed “ by one bishop ‡.” But as the record goes on in a strain of confirmation peculiarly characteristic of the times, and throwing a fine air of solemnity over the whole transaction, “ so do I EDWARD PLACE THIS “ PRIVILEGE,” or charter, “ WITH MY OWN HAND UPON THE ALTAR OF “ SAINT PETER; and LEADING THE PRELATE LEOFRIC BY THE RIGHT “ ARM, and MY QUEEN EADITHA LEADING HIM BY THE LEFT, do PLACE “ HIM IN THE EPISCOPAL CHAIR, my dukes and noble cousins, with “ my chaplains, being present §.”

In

* Monasticon, i. 229: “ Cathedram pontificalem consolidare Exoniæ civitatis in monas“ terio beati Petri Apostolorum principis, quod est situm infra mœnia ejusdem urbis.—In “ perpetuo tempore constituo—præsulem Leofricum, ut sit ibi pontifex, et post illum ceteri “ affuturi.”

† Monasticon, i. 229: “ Cornubiensis diocesis, quæ olim, in beati Germani memoriâ “ atque Petroci veneratione, episcopali solio assignata fuerat, ipsam cum omnibus sibi adja“ centibus parochiis,—Sancto Petro in Exoniensi civitate trado; scilicet, ut una sit sedes “ episcopalis, unumque pontificium, et una ecclesiastica regula, propter paucitatem, atque “ devastationem bonorum et populorum, quam piratici [apud] Cornubienses et Cridiatu-“ nenses ecclesias devastare poterant: ac, per hoc, in civitate Exoniæ tutiorem munitionem “ adversus hostes habere visum est.”

‡ Monasticon, i. 229: “ Et idcò ibi sedem esse volo, hoc est, in,” the sense requires the word should be ut, “ Cornubia cum suis ecclesiis, et Devoniam cum suis, simul in uno “ episcopatu sint, et ab uno episcopo regantur.”

§ Monasticon, i. 229: “ Ita hoc privilegium ego Edwardus rex manu meâ super altare

In this manner was the ancient episcopate of St. German's annihilated for ever, and Cornwall for ever deprived of an episcopate within itself. Yet even all this would not have been memorable in any other way, than as exhibiting a strong feature in the complexion of the times, and as constituting a grand æra in our provincial history; if it had not been accompanied with the mischiefs, which are usually attendant upon hasty reformatiions. Such reformatiions generally create more mischiefs than what they mean to remove. In the continuance of our Cornish episcopate, indeed, was no evil either actual or probable. The episcopate had existed for centuries, the child of necessity at first; but the parent of blessings to the country. The prelate was immediately present to his clergy, and his connexion with his diocese was closely kept up by his residence within it. Settled in person at the eastern extremity of his diocese, and settling his archdeacon near the other extremity, he would have enjoyed all that knowledge, personal or derivative, of his clergy and their congregations, which alone can enable any bishop to preside with propriety of conduct, because with discrimination of characters, over the persons of his diocese. But now the prelate is thrown to a great distance, to a distance of forty miles at least, from the nearest borders of his new diocese. And in a principle of policy superinduced upon this incident, that of retaining the archdeacon near the person of the prelate, to be his grateful friend in the chapter; his very substitute, his very eye in the estimation of our church-establishment, is also removed to the same distance. Thus all personal inspection is impossible to the bishop, and all inspection by proxy is equally impossible. His eye, like the eye of Jupiter upon Little St. Bernard, is wholly detached from the scene of vision to which it belongs, and lies at the foot of the “Sancti Petri pono; et præsulem Leofricum per dextrum brachium ducens, meaque regina Eaditha per sinistrum, in cathedrâ episcopali consisto; præsentibus meis ducibus et consanguineis nobilibus, necnon capellanis.” This remarkable installation is intended to be delineated, in the plate of Richardson’s Godwin, 395; but by a strange act of inattention, the king is placed where the prelate should be, and the prelate is exhibited with the queen leading the king. The sovereign is thus installed, instead of the bishop. He is led for installation in a form historically wrong, to a common chair, a single one too, placed above the steps of the altar, even close up to it. The real stalls remain at Exeter to this day; as I have noticed in ii. 1, before.

personage

personage who should be using it. And he himself, as the bishop of Cornwall, is now like the great Osiris of Egypt, waving a sceptre of sovereignty more in repute than in reality, and having his eye, a mere gem, perhaps bright in itself, yet still a mere gem, at the very end of his sceptre*.

SECTION

* See Course of Hannibal, i. 314-321.

Having spoken a little before concerning “the partial frenzy of the moment,” I wish here to add, that I thus allude to the whole of the war, in which refined France has been resolved into a merely military chaos of society, like that of ancient Gaule, has therefore been enabled, like Gaule, to pour forth its martial hordes of plundering barbarians upon the world, yet had been exerting all the artificial strength of a regular government for their pay, by coining credit into money, and substituting paper for silver or gold; has thus appeared in truth like a Megara, covered on the head with a hair of snakes, and armed in the hand with a whip of scorpions, dreadfully tormented in herself, and dreadfully tormenting the nations. But I allude particularly to the commencement of winter in 1794, a period uncommonly gloomy to this kingdom; when the spirit of innovation was wildly afloat among us; when reformation had greedily

. eaten of the insane root,

Which takes the reason prisoner;

and French republicanism, like an “Até hot from hell,” was ranging the continent with terror preceding, or destruction following it. Then it was that I came forward with my “Real Origin of Government.” This work, so necessary for the times, so boldly challenging all refutation, and so firmly founded upon the basis of infallible history, succeeded beyond my expectations. It became formidable enough, to provoke a public reprehension from the mouths of the unblushing THÉRÉSITES, and the unprincipled CÉRÈGUS in the late House of Commons. From such persons a man of any firmness of nerve, of any dignity of mind, could have nothing to dread—but their approbation; that approbation, which, like lightning, blasted whatever it touched.

It even stimulated their WHIG CLUB, as the centre of all the clubs of Jacobin Whigs in the kingdom, to enter into a formal denunciation of me; to proclaim it by the mouth of their rouge-dragon herald, that simple gentleman the late member for Bridport; to put me into the inquisitorial hands of the faction's lawyer, and (if he could once more find scope for turning the law against the constitution) to commence a prosecution of me, as a writer most “dangerous to their principles or practices.”

Nay, even that honest but hood-winked friend to religion, who has so strangely got among them, and of whom therefore we cannot

But wonder how the devil he came there, the papistical Dr. Plowden; who wildly mixes up his republicanism with his popery, and unites with his spiritual foes for the promotion of his secular purposes; took upon him, from the mere impotence of party-slander, to brand me in his Church and State, 581, 582,

SECTION II.

WHEN Edward thus united the episcopates of Cornwall and Devonshire together, he resigned up the Cornish, "with all the parishes, lands, manors, goods, and benefices belonging to it," into the hands of the bishop of Devonshire, now settled at Exeter*. What these were it may seem vain to inquire at this distance of time. But curiosity prompts every lively mind to inquiries, and the attempt frequently terminates in a happy discovery. The manors and benefices thus given, we may be sure, are all that the bishop now possesses in Cornwall, and as he had branded archdeacon Paley and bishop Hurd, in 1799, before, for the very sycophants of the ministry; just as he published to retract his slanders against them (see errata prefixed), afterwards to introduce himself into my house, while I was all unconscious of his charge, there, by artful questions, to find I was as innocent as I was unconscious, and then to beg my pardon for the public calumny by a private letter.

Who would not laugh, if such an one there be!

Who will not weep, since Atticus is he!

While indeed I have one spark of religion in my soul, I can never be a purveyor of principles for a minister. I could not, even if I had received particular favours from him, if I entertained a personal friendship for him, or if I could buckle my spirit within the belt of ambitious meanness to him. Still less could I, when I never received the slightest favour, when I never maintained the slightest acquaintance, when my life has been always actuated (I trust) by a proudly virtuous spirit of independency, and when I see in the minister's conduct to Mr. Reeves, how little he feels for his friends, even for his and the nation's best friends; as again I see in his more recent exemption of the Quakers from nearly three fourths of the pressure of the cavalry act, how ready he is to sacrifice principle to policy, and in the predominant cunning of his spirit to court those monied sectaries, even at the hazard of affronting, even with the certainty of injuring, the collective mass of his permanent friends, the clergy and laity of the church of England.

But, while I feel one ray of reason in my intellect, I must be a determined foe to an opposition, the most dangerous in my opinion, as the most flagitious in its views, of any that ever disgraced our history; the leader of which, a very CATILINE, wants apparently to erect an empire of anarchy, like the French, upon the ruins of all order, all property, all religion in the isle. The reprehension of such men I shall continue to court, and hope to obtain. Their censure is my pride. Their proscription is my honour. And the feeble lightnings, which their hands can dart at my head, will only play in a glory around it.

* Monasticon, i. 229: "Cum omnibus sibi adjacentibus parochiis, terris, villis, opibus, beneficiis."

that we find not to have been given since the Conquest. They were particularly those three villages, as bishop Gibson so grossly translates the “tres villas” of his author Camden, or those “three towns,” as Mr. Gough still more grossly renders the words; or those three manors, in the language of law and common sense; which are said to have been formerly possessed by the see of Devonshire ||. These indeed are asserted by the book of Winton monastery, as referred to by Camden and the old MS. in the Bodleian; to have been given by king Edward the son of Alfred, about the year 905, to ——— the bishop of Crediton †; at a time when Edward had no possessions in Cornwall, and when therefore he could bestow no manors within it. Yet they were given, says the Winton evidence, and the Oxford concurs with it; “that from “them he might every year make a visitation through the country of “the Cornish, to explain their errors to them, as they previously resisted “the truth with all their power, and were not obedient to the apostolical “decrees §.” But, that this notice may no longer impose upon scholars by its authority, let me fully expose its falsehood.

The donation is averred to have been made to the bishop of Crediton, and for his episcopal visitations in Cornwall; the very year in which one bishop was settled at Crediton, and another appointed for Cornwall, by this very Edward *. In the year 905, as we have frequently seen from Malmesbury before, Plegmund, archbishop of Canterbury, “ordained seven bishops for seven churchies,—Athelstan for that of Corn-

|| Camden, 138; Gibson, c. 19; Gough, i. 5; and Monasticon, i. 220. So “villis” in note above, and “villa” in Spelman.

† Camden, 138: “Edwardus senior sedem—episcopalem constituit, concessitque episcopo Cridiensi tres villas in hōc tractu.”

§ Camden, 138: “Ut inde singulis annis visitaret gentem Cornubiensem, ad exprimendos eorum errores; nam antea in quantum potuerunt veritati resistebant, et non decretis apostolicis obediebant.” And see Monasticon, i. 220.

* Camden, 138: “Circa annum—salutis 905,—Edwardus senior sedem—episcopalem “constituit” in Cornwall, “concessitque episcopo,” &c. Monasticon, i. 220: “Anno—“DCCCCV—Eadwardus—rex cum suis, et Plegmundus archiepiscopus,—constituere—vii “episcopos vii ecclesiis,—Athelstanum ad ecclesiam Corvinensem,—Eadulfum ad ecclesiam Cridiensem,” &c.

"wall,—Eidulph, for that of Crediton in Devonshire †." If, therefore, Athelstan became bishop of Cornwall according to Edward's appointment, Edward would certainly give no lands in Cornwall, to promote the visitations of the bishop of Crediton in it. If Athelstan became not bishop, Edward must have had no power in Cornwall to make him such, and consequently could have no power to promote, or to protect, the visits of his Devonshire bishop into Cornwall. With either member of the alternative, the alleged fact cannot be a real one.

But let me urge another argument, still more decisive against it. These manors, notes the Winton MS. which is all Camden's authority, were given to the bishop of Crediton, that he might visit Cornwall every year, and explain to the Cornish their errors in some points. This alludes principally to the general practice of the Cornish and other Britons, as to the day of observing Easter. The disputes between the Britons and Saxons concerning this, are well known to the public; but the real reason of them is little known. This dispute was not the same with that between Anicetus the bishop of Rome and Polycarp the martyr of Smyrna; Polycarp urging for the observance of Easter with the Jews, upon the fourteenth day of the moon, whether a Sunday or not, and Anicetus pressing to observe it on the Sunday immediately after the fourteenth. This difference was debated between them, in the very temper and spirit of two men worthy to be bishops, with some degree of earnestness, but without the least animosity. Such, however, we could not expect to be the conduct of common bishops, common clergymen, or common Christians. The dispute grew warm afterwards, between the Eastern and the Western churches; those alleging the practice of St. Philip and St. John, these appealing to that of St. Paul and St. Peter, as transmitted by tradition to them respectively, yet both perhaps very truly. But the great council of Nice, among other points of infinitely greater consequence, attended to this also; settling the dispute for ever in that decisive mode, in which half the disputes of man must be settled for the sake of peace, and by which alone such a dispute as this could ever be settled at all, by making the minority yield to the majority, and determining for the Sunday next after the fourteenth day of the moon *. The Britons had always kept their Easter so, and had only to go on in their old course. We have seen it asserted indeed, by a writer of genius and judgment, in that spirit of refining too subtilly upon little incidents in history, which seems to characterize the bolder efforts of historical antiquarianism at present, and which is apt, in the ignorance of the antiquary, to lead him wildly astray; that “the most ancient churches of Britain were founded, in all probability, by Asiatic missionaries;” that “the conformity of their belief and practice in the affair of Easter, to that which prevailed among the Christians of the East, strengthens [gives ground to] this opinion;” and that the British churches were founded probably by Polycarp himself, because “the most ancient British Christians—adopted Polycarp’s system with regard to Easter,” as, “like him, they refused to conform to the custom of the Western church †.” But, in all this, we see the fabulousness of heathenism realized in reasoning, and the whole weight of the heavens rested upon—the back of a man. Or, to speak with a more pointed preciseness to the case, his argument is rested like the real heavens—upon air. The truth is, that the historical fact is entirely the reverse of what is here averred, that the British Christians did not conform to the sentiments of Polycarp, but did conform to the opinions of his opponent Anicetus. This is decisively attested by the emperor Constantine himself, in an epistle which he wrote upon the subject; because in this he expressly assures us, that “Easter is used to be celebrated in Britain after the same manner as it is at Rome ‡.” The Britons derived their Christianity, with all their modes of Christian worship, immediately from their masters the Romans. They thus came of course, to keep their Easter in the Roman form. And nothing but a chaos of confusion, generated in the mind by a collision of ideas, between this and a subsequent dispute about Easter, could ever have suggested a thought,

† Malmesbury, f. 26: "Anno quo a Nativitate Domini transacti sunt anni nongenti quatuor,—rex Edwardus—et episcopi—constituerunt—episcopos—, Adelstanum ad [ecclesiam] Cornubiensem,—Eidulfum ad Cridiensem in Devonîâ."

* See Bede, p. 694-696, for a learned and judicious dissertation on the subject, by the editor, Smith.

† Dr. John Macpherson, in his Critical Dissertations, p. 360, 365, 366.

‡ Smith’s Dissertation, p. 696: “Diserte—testatur Constantinus, in epistola quam de hac re scripsit, eodem modo ac Romæ in Britannia Pascha celebrari solitum.”

of composing a world in history from such a forced combination of re-coiling atoms*. For a dispute afterwards arose, how the Nicene rule was to be practised, and what was the best cycle of years for regulating the practice. Thus the Britons of Cornwall, of Wales, and of Scotland, observed Easter upon the fourteenth day of the moon, if it was a Sunday, or, if not, upon any other Sunday up to the twenty-first; while other churches observed it, not upon the fourteenth at all, but only upon any Sunday after it up to the twenty-first†. Nor did our British ancestors derive even this variation from any communication with the Christians of the East. They actually derived it from that very cycle of eighty-four years, which the Romans themselves had used to the days of Leo the Great; while the Romans had now adopted the Alexandrian cycle of nineteen years, and communicated it to the Saxons by Augustine‡. So strangely has the history here been set upon its head! Against this Roman custom in the Britons, the Romish Saxons spoke and wrote. About 710, "Naitan, king of the Picts, inhabiting the " northern regions of Britain," as Bede informs us, "—renounced the " error in which he and his people had hitherto been held, as to the " observance of Easter, and came over himself with all his subjects, to " keep the Catholic time of our Lord's resurrection,—after the example " of the holy, Roman, and apostolical church §." About 705, notes Bede

* Dr. Borlase is one who has confounded this dispute with the subsequent one, when in p. 376, he speaks of that between the Britons and Saxons; but then, as an explanation of it, subjoins in a note the nature of that between the Eastern and Western churches, previously to the council of Nice. Dr. John Macpherson too has so far confounded the two disputes again, as to make the confusion the very groundwork of his historical hypothesis. In p. 366, he observes, that "the most ancient British Christians,—in their disputes with Italian missionaries, always appealed to the authority of St. John and the other Eastern divines." The words "Italian missionaries," here coupled with "the most ancient British Christians," with "St. John," and with "the other Eastern divines," should have roused him effectually from his reverie.

† Smith's Dissertation, p. 697, 698, 699, 698, and 703.

‡ Smith, p. 698, 703, and 701, 702.

§ Bede's Hist. vi. 21: "Eo tempore Naiton, rex Pictorum qui septentrionales Britanniae plagas inhabitant,—abrenunciavit errori quo catenus in observatione Paschæ cum suâ gente tenebatur, et se suosque omnes ad Catholicum Dominicæ resurrectionis tempus celebrandum perduxit,—ad exemplum sævætæ, Romanæ, et apostolicæ ecclesiæ."

also,

also, “Aldhelm, at the command of a synod in West-Saxony, wrote “an excellent book against that error of the Britons, from which—they “celebrate Easter at a wrong time; and brought over many of those “Britons who were subject to the western Saxons, by the reading of it, “to the Catholic celebration of the Lord's Pasover *.” Or, as Malmesbury remarks with a fuller attention to the success, because, at a later period of time, when Aldhelm's “book” had had a longer trial among the Cornish, and the effect of its operations could be more conspicuously seen;
 “the labour of this very holy man could not lose its effect, but rather “received a glorious conclusion, and converted the erroneous to true “religion: even at this day DO THE BRITONS OWE THEIR CORRECTION “TO ALDELM †.” So palpably false in fact is that assertion demonstrated to be, which makes king Edward, in 905, to bestow manors in Cornwall upon a bishop, “that from them he might every year make a “visitation through the country of the Cornish, to explain their errors
 “to them, as previously [and then] resisting the truth with all their power,
 “and being not obedient to the apostolical decrees.” The convincing work of Adhelm had been addressed to them in a letter to their king, two centuries before; had two centuries before “brought over many of” them; and one or two centuries before had “received a glorious conclu“sion,” in “converting the erroneous to true religion,” in making “the Britons” of Cornwall “owe their correction” entirely “to “Aldelm ‡.”

Yet

* Bede's Hist. v. 18: “Aldhelm—, jubente synodo suæ gentis, librum egregium adver“sus errorem Brittonum, quo—Pascha non suo tempore celebrant,—multosque eorum qui “occidentalibus Saxonibus subditi erant Brittones, ad Catholicam Dominici Paschæ cele-“brationem hujus lectione perduxit.”

† Malmesbury, in Gale, i. 349: “Nec potuit priyari effectu sanctissimi viri labor, quin “potius, laudabilem accipiens finem, ad veram errantes convertit religionem. Debent usque “hodie Britanni correctionem suam Aldelmo.”

‡ This was a letter addressed “to Geruntius, king of the Cornubian Britons” (Usher, 478), said by Malmesbury to have been destroyed by the Cornish, “volumen pessundede“runt” (Gale, i. 349); an assertion utterly incredible in itself, that the Cornish should destroy what had been the very instrument of their conversion; and refuted by positive fact, as the letter exists to this day, “inter Bonifacianas [epistolas] in ordine centesima vigesima

Yet these manors were actually given to a bishop, and were actually a part of the possessions belonging to the see of St. German's. They were "Polton," and "Cæling," and "Lanwitham." Polton is expressly noticed in Domesday Book, as then an estate held under the bishopric of Exeter; is even placed at the head of an ecclesiastical deanery, in the Valor of 1292; and is now the great manor of "Boltong alias Pawton," in the parish of St. Breock*. Lanwitham is equally noticed in Domesday Book, as belonging to the bishop; stands equally the head of a deanery in the Valor, but was then written as it now is Lawhitton, the n of Lan being suppressed in pronunciation equally as with Lamorran; and remains the property of the bishop at present†. But he who has successfully appropriated both these names, even bishop Gibson, confesses himself all unable to appropriate Cæling‡. From the similarity of the names, the only evidence that we can have in a case like this, I believe it to be Calling-ton, alias Kelling-ton; alienated from the bishopric before the Conquest, and therefore not included in the lands of it. Two of the three, then, appear decisively to have been the possessions of the Cornish see; and others appear to have been equally such, in this extract from the Domesday Book for Cornwall:

"THE LAND OF THE BISHOP OF EXECESTRE."

"THE BISHOP OF EXETER holds TREWEL. In the time of king Edward it gelded for one hide and a half. The land is xx carucates. In demesne are ii carucates, and iiii servi and xxx villani and iiii bordarii

"nona" (Smith's Bede, p. 702). The letter is also given us in English, by Cressy, 481-483. It turns upon other points, besides the observance of Easter.

Dr. Borlase, 378, supposes the error of the Cornish to have been, "their refusing to acknowledge the papal authority;" when the very cycle, for which the Cornish and other Britons contended, was originally Roman itself; and when, therefore, the only contention could be, for one cycle Roman against another equally Roman. In writing upon such points, our authors are almost sure to shew their protestantism at the expense of their understandings.

* Gibson, c. 19; and Hals, 32, 33.

† Gibson, ibid.

‡ Gibson, ibid. From this difficulty, perhaps, Mr. Hals, 18, has silently changed "Cæling" into "Cuddan-Beake," a manor soon noticed by Mr.

“ with xii carucates. There, is a pasture of ii miles long and ii miles broad, and lx acres of wood. Formerly and now it was and is worth ‘ iiii pounds §.’ This I take to be Trewella in the parish of Cury, long since alienated from the see.

“ The same bishop holds MATELE. In the time of king Edward “ it gelded for i hide, but yet there is one hide and a half. In “ demesne is one carucate, and iiii servi and xy villani and iiii bordarii “ with viii carucates. There, are xl acres of pasture, and lx acres of “ underwood. Formerly and now it was and is worth xl shillings. “ The market of this manor is held by the earl of Moriton, which the “ bishop held in the time of king Edward *.” This manor seems to be Methleigh, in the adjoining parish of Breague, mentioned as Methcele in the hundred of Kerrier by a record the 12th of Edward I.†. Both this and the other come very early in the endowment of our Cornish bishopric, to shew us the predatory violence of the Normans towards the clergy, as well as the laity, of the Saxons. We see this strikingly exemplified in the church of St. Neot, which was robbed of all its lands, except a single acre, by the earl, and, to the everlasting disgrace of the earl, is recorded by this very Domesday Book to have been thus § Vol. i. fol. 120.

“ TERRA EPISCOPI DE EXCESTRE.

“ EPISCOPUS EXONIENSIS tenet TREWEL. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida et dimidia. “ Terra est xx carucatæ. In dominio sunt ii carucatæ, et iiii servi et xxx villani et iiii bordarii cum xii carucatis. Ibi pastura ii lencas longa et ii lencas lata, et lx acra silvæ. “ Olim et modo valet iiii libras.” See Ingulphus, f. 516, 517, for the proper reading of some of these terms at full length, which are so much abbreviated in the original.—I have not translated here or hereafter, the terms “ servi,” or “ villani,” or “ bordarii;” because, whatever I may know or think of their respective meanings, happily for our present state of society we have no appropriate terms to convey those meanings to the mind.

* Fol. 120: “ Idem episcopus tenet MATELE. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida, sed tamen “ ibi una hida et dimidia. Terra est xv carucatæ. In dominio est i carucata, et iiii servi “ et xv villani et iiii bordarii cum viii carucatis. Ibi xl acra pasturæ, et lx acra silvæ “ minutæ. Olim et modo valet xl solidos. Forum huius manerii habet comes Moritonie, “ quod episcopus habebat T. R. E.”

† Carew, f. 46.

robbed by him ‡. We see it again, in a lesser degree, robbing the bishop of the profits of his market at Matele. Both the injuries are registered in this grand roll of property, and both without any reparation intimated to have been made, or even hinted to be intended. Such an evidence have we here before us, of the oppressiveness of this earl over the Cornish, and of the connivance of the crown at it.

“ The same bishop holds TREGEL. In the time of king Edward it “ gelded for ii hides, but yet there are here xii hides. The land is lx “ carucates. In demesne are ii carucates, and vi servi and xviii villani “ and xii bordarii with xvi carucates. There, is a pasture half a mile “ long and as much broad, a wood i mile long and half an one broad. “ Formerly it was worth c shillings, now it is worth viii pounds ||.” This I suppose to be, what is now called Tregella, and lies in the parish of Padstow. But this estate also, like the two before, thus dedicated to spiritual purposes, has since become secularized again; and Tregel has, equally with Matele or Trewel, been degraded from the office of ministering at the altar of God, into the service of attending upon the humble board of man.

“ The same bishop holds PAUTONE. In the time of king Edward it “ gelded for viii hides, but yet there are there xliiii hides. The land is “ lx carucates. In demesne are iii carucates, and vi servi and xl villani “ and xl bordarii with xl carucates. There, is a pasture vi miles long and ii “ miles broad, a wood ii miles long and one broad. Formerly it was

‡ F. 121: “ Totam hanc terram præter unam acram terræ, quam presbyteri habent, “ abstulit comes ab ecclesiâ.”

|| F. 120: “ Idem episcopus tenet ~REGEL. T. R. E. geldabat pro ii hidis, sed tamen “ sunt ibi xii hidæ. Terra est lx carucatæ. In dominio sunt ii carucatæ, et vi servi et xviii “ villani et xii bordarii cum xvi carucatis. Ibi pastura dimidiam leucam longa, et tan- “ tundem lata, silva i leucam longa et dimidiam lata. Olim c solidos, modo valet viii “ libras.” That ~REGEL is a complication or ligature of letters for TREGEL, though TR is used also at times without any ligature or complication; is plain from “ Abbacia ~RINITA- “ TIS,” in fol. 126.

“ and

“and now is worth x pounds*.” This is the Pawton noticed by me before, under the name of Polton, and called “Polton, alias Pawton,” at present; but equally with Tregel, Matele, Trewel, and Cæling, alienated from the bishopric. This, however, appears not to have been torn away by the strong hand of sacrilegious power, but to have fairly migrated in the course of exchange, into hands equally spiritual as the bishop’s. Thus only could it have been, as it certainly was, annexed to the priory of Bodmin, after the date of Domesday Book. The prior possessed it, and had a house with a deer-park upon it. The fences of the latter are still apparent, as are also the double walls of the former, upon what is denominated the Barton of Pawton †.

“The same bishop holds BERNERH. In the time of king Edward it gelded for one hide with xxiii pounds. The land is xii carucates. In demesne are ii carucates, and vi servi and viii villani and xii bordarii with vi carucates. There, are lx acres of pasture and x acres of wood. Formerly it was and now is worth xl shillings ‡.” This manor is Burnear, lying in the parish of St. Minver, and still adhering to the see §.—But I now come to the manor that is very familiar to all my readers, and the very centre of all my large circle. One leg of my compasses being fixed at St. German’s, I have turned the other with a sweep over the whole island.

“The same bishop holds the manor which is called THE CHURCH OF SAINT GERMAN. There, are xxiii hides. Of these, xii hides belong to

* F. 120: “Idem episcopus tenet PAUTONE. T. R. E. geldabat pro viii hidis, sed tamen ibi sunt xliiii hidæ. Terra est lx carucatæ. In dominio sunt iii carucatæ, et vi servi et xl villani et xl bordarii cum xl carucatis. Ibi pastura vi leucas longa et ii leucas lata, silva ii leucas longa et unam lata. Olim x libras, modo valet.”

† Hals, 32.

‡ F. 120: “Idem episcopus tenet BERNERH. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida f [see the end of the extracts for this letter or figure] xxiii libras. Terra est xii carucatæ. In dominio sunt ii carucatæ, et vi servi et viii villani et xii bordarii cum vi carucatis. Ibi lx acræ pasturæ, et x acræ silvæ. Olim et modo valet xl solidos.”

§ Hals’s MS. at the close, and Norden, 71.

“ the canons, which never gelded ; and the other xii hides belong to the “ bishop, and gelded for ii hides in the time of king Edward. In this
 “ the bishop’s part, the land is xx carucates. In demesne are ii caru“ cates, and iiii servi and xxx villani and xii bordarii with xvi carucates.
 “ There, is a pasture iiii miles long and ii miles broad, a wood ii miles “ long and i mile broad. Formerly it was worth c shillings, now it is “ worth viii pounds. In the part belonging to the canons, the land is “ xl carucates. In demesne are ii carucates, and ii servi and xxiiii vil-“ lani and xx bordarii with xxiiii carucates. There, is a pasture ii miles “ broad [long] and i mile broad, a wood iiii miles long and ii broad.
 “ It is worth c shillings to the canons. In this manor is a market on “ the Lord’s Day, but it is reduced to nothing in favour of the market “ of the earl of Moriton, which is very near to it*.” We have thus before us a description of the manor of St. German’s, that from its ear-liness and authenticity is of peculiar importance. We see it partitioned, as the manor of the church, equally between the see and the priory.
 This evenness of distribution shews it to have been made, by one and the same person. Athelstan, therefore, was that person. Athelstan dispensed his royal manor in exact proportions, to his new priory and to the ancient bishopric. In addition to the tithes, and to some glebe probably, possessed by the rector before ; he gave half of the manor, because he had cut up the single rector, like a polypus, into no less than nine†. In addition too to the other manors, which had been previously settled upon the see by the munificence of our Cornish kings ;

* F. 120 : “ Idem episcopus tenet manerium quod vocatur ecclesia Sancti Germani. Ibi “ sunt xxiiii hidæ. Ex his xii hidæ sunt canonicorum, quæ nunquam geldaverunt ; et aliæ “ xii hidæ sunt episcopi, et geldabant pro ii hidis T. R. E. In hac parte episcopi, terra est “ xx carucatæ. In dominio sunt ii carucatæ, et iiii servi et xxx villani et xii bordarii cum “ xvi carucatis. Ibi pastura iiii leucas longa et ii leucas lata, silva ii leucas longa et unam “ leucam lata. Olim c solidos, modo valet viii libras. In parte canonicorum, terra est xl “ carucatæ. In dominio sunt ii carucatæ, et ii servi et xxiiii villani et xx bordarii cum xxiiii “ carucatis. Ibi pastura ii leucas lata [longa] et unam leucam lata, silva iiii leucas longa “ et ii leucas lata. Valet c solidos canonicis. In hoc manerio est mercatum in Die Domi-
 “ nico, sed ad nichilum redigitur pro mercato comitis Moritonix, quod ibi est proximum.”

† Leland’s Coll. i. 75 : “ S. Germanus in Cornubiâ. Prior. or. S. Aug. octo canon. et “ prior.”

and to some land probably, ranging close about the palace, the gift of that king who first fixed a prelate at this church; he gave the other half of his manor to the prelate, for ever. He thus made them co-partners in the whole; while the whole was denominated the church's manor, as possessed equally by the bishop and by the chapter of it. But their respective halves are fairly defined, and the reciprocal shares decisively ascertained. The chapter's share was worth five pounds a year, at the Conquest; as the bishop's, which had been only five pounds a little before, from some accidental improvements in value, even under the removal of the bishop himself to Exeter, probably from this very removal, as before occupied, and now set out, had risen to eight pounds.

A town indeed had been built upon the manor, and a market had been established within it; a market, to our surprise, held upon a Sunday, so held undoubtedly at first because of the resort of the parishioners to the church, but forming surely a scene of business, a tone of clamour, and a hurry of bustle, very incompatible with the religious recollectedness of the day. Yet this market had not been, as at first we are naturally inclined to suppose it had, the beneficial cause of this improvement in the bishop's lands. The improvement had been very lately made, even while the market had been reduced to nothing. So reduced it was by a new market, which the Norman earl of Cornwall had established in the neighbourhood, and which had drawn off the people from their customary attendance. The new market was settled by the earl, near his castle of Trematon, and on the present site of Saltash there; as this very record notices his "castle," with his "market" at it, the latter producing him annually "three shillings*." Markets were then rare in themselves, having been introduced originally by the Romans, as their Roman appellation testifies†, and then settled only at their stationary towns; yet were as necessary then as they are now. They therefore operated as so many vortices upon the country round, forming a strong suction from all the contiguous parts, even extending their influence perceptibly to a considerable distance. Thus a new market, about three miles from St. German's, under the patronage of the earl, and with the custom of his family within the castle, could counteract the suction from the market already established, even turn the direction of the waters, and bring them all to flow into its own bosom. What was thus lost by St. German's was gained by Saltash; and the tolls, we see, amounted to "three shillings" a year, a sum that is apt, from its smallness, to raise a smile upon the face of a modern reader, but, considered in union with the value of the whole manor at the time, is not insignificant in itself. The town, therefore, is certainly prior to the Conquest, and almost coæval with Athelstan's church, probably with the erection of the priory, or with the cession of the manor to the prior and the bishop.

* F. 122: "Ibi habet comes unam castrum, et mercatum reddens iii solidos."

† "Mercatus," from the "mercatura" exercised there.

Yet the town, like the manor, was divided betwixt the bishop and prior, as it remains divided to the present day: what is now denominated the borough, and was formerly the prior's part, does not extend its limits over the whole, is even confined within narrow bounds, and actually comprehends only about fifty or sixty houses near the church*. Thus did a great part of the town belong to the bishop, as it still belongs to the bishop's lessee; but only the smaller part, the prior's, has always possessed the privilege of a parliamentary borough; not, indeed, according to Mr. Willis's conjecture, obtaining the privilege perhaps from Walter bishop of Exeter in the time of Henry III. †, as then the bishop's part would perhaps have been exclusively privileged; not, too, according to Mr. Willis's contrary supposition, from the prior's co-operation with the bishop in bestowing the privilege ‡, as then the two

* Willis, 147.

† Willis, 148: "The episcopal palace at Cuddenbeak,—a quarter of a mile above the town,—is stiled in some writings Cuddenbeak borough, a privilege which it might perhaps obtain from Walter bishop of Exeter, temp. Hen. III. when Penryn seems to have been made a borough." Mr. Willis must mean by his reasoning all the bishop's part of the town, though in his language he confines himself to the palace alone, a quarter of a mile out of the town.

‡ Willis, 148: "From this example" of Cuddenbeak borough, "the prior, with the assistance of the bishop, might also so dignify the vill of St. German's."

parts would have shared it equally; not even, according to another hypothesis of Mr. Willis, directly contrary to both, in that commonly practised mode of creating such privileges, by ignorantly mistaking the import of the word borough, by wildly imagining every borough, as such, to have a right of electing representatives, and by thus exalting many of the civil boroughs of the realm, so diffused over all the face of it, yet so very ancient in themselves, into that merely modern creation of boroughs sending some of their burgesses to parliament §. No! The town appears not to have been ever a civil borough before it became a parliamentary one. Neither the bishop nor the prior, when they certify respectively their claims of liberties or privileges in the 30th of Edward I. and when these were recorded for their security among the pleas of the crown, gave the town any other designation than that of the manor of St. German's ||, as a part included in the whole, as a part undistinguished from the rest by any burgensic liberties: nor does the town appear under any other than this general appellation, nor does one record hint at its incorporation, nor does one authority whisper a single privilege belonging to it as a town, before the very recent reign of—Elizabeth ¶. In the 5th of this queen's reign, and to the parliament of January 1563, it ventured to choose representatives for the first time. The right was questioned when the act was done; the town was called upon to shew its authority for the act, and then—the whole was passed over in silence. Such was the loose state of this part of our constitution under that imperious sovereign Elizabeth! such particularly was the slack and slight rein which the government, however imperious, then chose to put upon the presumption of towns, in arrogating the right of election to parliament! Nothing appears to have been done, nothing (we may therefore be sure) was done, and the town (with only one interruption, § Willis advances this hypothesis unknown to himself, when he says “the episcopal palace at Cuddenbeak,” and means the episcopal part of the town, “is styled in some writings Cuddenbeak borough.” No part of the town could be called a borough, except as a civil borough, before a year hereafter mentioned; and Mr. Willis's “some writings,” so dubiously noticed, are mere nullities in themselves.

|| Willis, 148.

¶ Willis, 148.

for the parliament immediately succeeding in the 8th of Elizabeth) has continued to elect ever since*. The very same year did St. Mawes presume to exercise the same right, was questioned in the same manner about it, and (with the same interruption for the parliament immediately succeeding) was permitted to exercise it ever afterwards†. This indulgence I have attributed before to the influence of the queen, the probable proprietor of the town at the time; but that must have been occasioned by a principle very different, as St. German's was certainly not in the crown; and, in all probability, by some compromise made by the royal with the private proprietors. That resulted originally, no doubt, from the activity of the Champernoun, who was heir to the first receiver of the priory from king Henry in 1542, and who transferred it over to Richard Eliot, esq. thirty or forty years afterward‡. Inheriting the bold adventurous spirit of such a receiver, he pushed the inhabitants of the town upon that act of presumption; he bore them out in it by his compromise probably with the lord steward, then the sole settler of contested elections§; and he continued to repeat the unchecked presumption in a third parliament, the 13th of Elizabeth, 1571||. Then came Mr. Eliot, not so late as 1575, when Mr. Willis intimates he came, but, what Mr. Willis's own evidences shew, as early as 1571-2; and so became one of the representatives himself in a fourth parliament, that of 1572¶. In such an extraordinary manner have two of our Cornish villages been elevated into parliamentary boroughs! For this elevation of St. German's, Champernoun gave it a mayor in the first return, and (to cast a deeper shade of antiquity over his own creation) a port-reve in the second, though he betrayed the whole of the imposition by his variation in the title, and the town has had a port-reve ever since††. This officer he made the jury of the manor to elect in the court-leet of the manor at Michaelnas; and all the householders who had lived a twelvemonth in the town, so were competent to serve as jurymen in

* Willis, 146, 147, and Statute Book.

† Willis, 168.

‡ Willis, 143.

§ Willis, 146.

|| Willis, 147 and 153.

¶ Willis, 153: "14 at West. Thomas Ashe, gent. Richard Eliot, gent."

 Willis, 146, 147.

†† Willis, 147.

the manor-court, he made to elect the representatives‡. But he carefully confined the privilege of elections to his own part of the town, to that which he held in fee simple from the grant of the crown and the confirmation of a statute; denying it to the bishop's part, though great in itself§. because he possessed this by a lease alone. “The division of “the town into two manors,” says Mr. Willis, “—continues at this “day; the bishop's moiety being held by lease of three lives by Edward “Eliot, esq. proprietor also of the other manor, whose predecessors,” Champernouns as well as Eliots, “have probably ever since the dissolution of monasteries,” and consequently many years before the Eliots came, “been farmers or lessee-tenants to the see of Exeter||.” We thus account for that concession of an elective franchise to the town, which has never been accounted for before; and they suggest the reason for that confinement of the franchise, which appears so extraordinary in itself, but which refuted the very conjectures hitherto formed for its commencement¶.

Yet, to pursue the history of the town a little further, the market still continued in it long after the Conquest. In the 30th of Edward I. among the manerial privileges claimed by the bishop and the prior was a market and a fair*; the latter recently kept on the 1st of August, but kept originally on the day of the parish-feast, the day of St. German's death, the 31st of July†; the former not annihilated by the market of

‡ Willis, 147.

§ Willis, 147: “Great part of which [vill of St. German's] is without the borough.”

|| Willis, 143.

¶ Supposing Mr. Willis to mean what he mentions, that “the episcopal palace” is “styled in some writings Cuddenbeak borough,” and supposing his “some writings” to carry any weight with them, then the palace was so called as the borough or castellated house of the bishop: so we have a parliamentary borough now in Shropshire, from the castellated house of the bishop, yet remaining in its ruins, denominated Bishopscastle. But I still believe the “some writings” to be merely an imposition put upon Mr. Willis; such as I well remember to have heard in his lifetime, as often put upon him by men more witty than wise, more jocular than good, mischievously sportive, and malignantly merry.

* Willis, 148.

† Willis, 141.

Saltash, but injured essentially in its tolls, reduced almost to a shadow half a century ago, yet observed no longer upon a Sunday, and now disused entirely. It ceased to be observed upon this day so devoted to religion, in consequence of a general law forbidding any to be kept upon it; a statute of the 27th of Henry VI. 1448, “considering the “abominable injuries and offences done to Almighty God, and to his “saints, always aiders and singular assisters in our necessities, because “of fairs and markets upon their high and principal feasts, as in the “feast of the Ascension of our Lord, in the day of Corpus Christi, in “the day of Whitsunday, in Trinity Sunday, with other Sundays, and “also in the high feast of the Assumption of our Blessed Lady, the day “of All Saints, and on Good Friday, accustomed and miserably [memo“rially] holden and used in the realm of England; in which principal “and festival days, for great earthly covetise, the people is more will“ingly vexed, and in bodily labour foiled, than in other ferial days, as “in fastening and making their booths and stalls, bearing and carrying, “lifting and placing their wares outward and homeward, as though “they did nothing remember the horrible defiling of their souls, in “buying and selling with many deceitful lies and false perjury, with “drunkenness and strifes, and so specially withdrawing themselves and “their servants from divine service‡.” The market thus appears to have been kept from the time of Athelstan to the reign of the sixth Henry, through a period of five hundred years, upon a Sunday. Then the nation seemed to awake into a general feeling of propriety upon the point, prohibited all markets for the future upon a Sunday, and even in the keenness of a new sensation extended the prohibition, not merely to Good Friday, which we still observe with religious reverence, and must observe while we continue to be Christians, but to Ascension-day, which we honour only by particular offices in public worship; to the day of All Saints, which we consider merely as a common holyday; to the day of the Virgin Mary’s Assumption, and to the day of Corpus Christi, both which we have long ceased to observe at all. It even, in its ‡ Cap. v. The law accordingly orders, that “all manner of fairs and markets in the said “principal feasts and Sundays and Good Friday, shall clearly cease.”

new zeal, adduced reasons against the keeping of markets, and the observance of fairs, those greater markets as merely annual upon such days, which would be equally forcible against the observance and keeping upon any. The people, says the law, “ did nothing remember the horrible defiling of their souls, in buying and selling with many deceitful lies and false perjury, with drunkenness and strifes,” practices criminal upon any days. But, amidst such intemperance, the statute very soberly and sensibly rests its own prohibition upon this; that on such days “ the people is more willingly vexed, and in bodily labour foiled, than in other ferial” or holy “ days,” as gaining by the markets on Sundays one day more in the week for their secular attentions, “ in fastening and making [fast] * their booths and stalls, bearing and carrying, lifting and placing, their wares outward and homeward;” and that “ so” they were “ specially withdrawing themselves and their “ servants from divine service” on Sunday.

“ As to a description of this borough,” adds Mr. Willis concerning what he ought to have denominated the town, as he means both the parts of it, the burgensic and the extra-burgensic, both “ called in ‘ Carew ‘ the Church-town,’ ” a popular appellation in Cornwall for any group of houses near the church; “ ‘ it mustereth,’ ” as that author tells us, “ ‘ sundry ruins but little wealth, occasioned (as some conceive) by abandoning their fishing-trade, or (as the greater sort imagine) by their being deserted by the religious’ ;” for “ its chief support “ was certainly heretofore the priory; the houses being very meanly “ built, and irregular, and situate on an uneven rock, affording no “ tolerable reception for travellers, or people who come to the market to “ which this town pretends a title;” pretends one too from a higher antiquity, and upon a more substantial authority than most of the market-towns in the kingdom; “ and has a small peddling one on Fridays, “ almost unfrequented. The little trade it drives is by fishing in Tiddi-

* This is the old and popular sense of the word make; in Lancashire to this day all ranks of natives make doors, make windows, by shutting them: so in Leland's Itin. iii. 36, “ a warfe to make shippes by.”

“ford river, which” a little below the priory terminates in the Limer, as the Limer “about ten [five] miles downwards empties itself into” the Tamar, then on its speedy entrance within “the harbour of Plymouth;” the Tiddiford river “washing the lower parts of the town” of St. German’s, according to Mr. Willis, but in fact running at a little distance from every part, and washing only the lands of the priory, or the site of Cuddenbeak †. This tone of lamentation over the town of St. German’s, so natural to an antiquary when he does not think, when he only feels, and when in that feeling he reflects only on the dissolution of the priory, has been echoed from one writer to another, till it has been taken at last for the very voice of truth. The first note was set by Leland in this account: “S. Germane’s is but a poore fischar town, the “glory of it stood by the priory ‡.” But Leland had a reason for the note, which none of the repeaters have had since; the expulsion of the clergy from the priory, and the non-substitution of the Eliots in their room. Since this family has resided in the priory, the town has had no cause to deplore the absence of its clergy; the rents of the priory-lands, the rents of the bishops, and the rents of various estates beside, have been all expended at the town: much more has therefore been laid out there by the secular prior than could have been by the regular. The trade of fishing, indeed, which might be encouraged by the fasts of the clergy upon fish, yet was equally encouraged by the fish-fasts, enjoined in special laws upon all for a long time after the Reformation, cannot be supposed to have declined while the encouragement was continued; and, in fact, is falsely asserted by Carew before to have been “abandoned” in his time, either in 1586, when he was writing his work, or in 1602, when he published it §. “In the church-towne,” says Norden in 1584, “are manie inhabitantes, but (as it seemeth) noe greate “riches; it hath bene farr more populous,” a declaration supported by no proof, opposed by every testimony, and encountered by every probability; “but the decaye hath growne by 3 severall meanes; firste, “by the discontinuance of the bushopes sea,” a discontinuance even † Willis, 148, 149; and Carew, 109.

§ Life of Carew prefixed, xvii. and xx.

‡ Leland’s Itin. iii. 40.

then near five centuries and a half before, when the town could have had no importance to lose; “—the seconde, the subpressing of the “ pryoric, which was a meane to drawe inhabitantes,” but a much stronger than which has surely been furnished by the residence of the Eliots here; “ and lastly, by their own neglecte of the commodious “ trade of fishinge*.” Here the “ abandoned” trade of Carew is only the “ neglected” of Norden, and in reality was not either neglected or abandoned then. Camden, who first published in 1586, after more than ten years of travels†; who republished in 1590, 1594, 1607; who had seen Carew’s remarks in manuscript before his first publication‡, and had even seen them in print before his last§, continues in all his three last editions to affirm the actual prosecution of the fishery, yet to expose the poor appearance of the town. “ At the village of St. German’s,” he tells us, “—is a small church dedicated to St. German of Auxerre, in which sat a very few bishops;—I say the village of St. German’s, for there is nothing else there at present but the cottages “ of fishermen, who carry on a pretty extensive fishery in the ocean “ and in the adjoining rivers ||.” The fishery, we see, was then prosecuted

* Norden, 93. From Carew, 109, has Norden copied this folly, prudently omitting some strokes in it. Ascribing the supposed declension of the town to the expulsion of “ the religious people,” Carew thus subjoins; “ for, in former times, the bishop of Cornwall’s see was from St. Petrock’s in Bodmyn remooved hither, as from hence, when the “ Cornish dioces united with Devon, it passed to Crediton,” an assertion against fact, as we have seen before, “ and lastly from thence to Excester; but this first losse receyved relief through a succeeding priory,” as if the priory begun after the bishopric had been removed. Such a mere gossipier in antiquarianism is this celebrated antiquary! in the infancy of antiquarianism among us, even such a petty narrator of impertinences could gain celebrity, si dñs placet, as an antiquary.

† Gibson’s Life of Camden prefixed to his Camden.

‡ Carew’s Life prefixed to his work, xvii.

§ In 1590, p. 126: “ Hæc planius et melius docebit Richardus Carew de Authonie,—“ qui hujus regionis descriptionem latiore specie, et non ad tenue, elimat.” So equally in 1586. (Carew’s Life, xvii.) In 1594, p. 131, as before, but with this addition, “ quem—“ que mihi præluxisse non possum non agnoscere.” But in 1607, p. 143, “ docuit” and “ elimavit.”

|| In 1590, p. 122: “ Ad S. German’s—ædicula S. Germano Autissiodorensi sacra, in “ qua

cuted so much with all its original vigour, that the town was “nothing else—but the cottages of fishermen.” It was thus also “a pretty extensive fishery,” not confined to Tiddiford river, not even keeping itself within the Limer or the Tamar, but pushing out into “the ocean:” yet the town, which was “poore” in Leland’s time, consisted only of “cottages” in Camden’s, and was merely “a village” therefore. The town thus appears in full possession of all its fishery, and in full enjoyment of all its opulence at that time; yet both had sunk away before the days of Mr. Willis, as “the little trade it drives,” he remarks, “is by fishing in Tiddiford river.” Nor must we suppose, in the fashionable strain of refining against the very evidence of facts, that what was “pretty extensive” in the estimate of Camden, was merely “little” in the ideas of Mr. Willis, from the rising scale of trade in the whole island since the days of Camden. The fishery was apparently decaying in the time of Mr. Willis, shrinking back from “the ocean” and “the adjoining rivers,” so confining itself to its own current: even there is it now discontinued. But tradition still speaks of it in a tone similar to Camden’s, as a fishery either principally or solely for pilchards, consequently out upon the sea, though merely for a short season. Yet the shoals of these annual migrants from the south-western depths of the Atlantic to the coasts of Bretagne and Cornwall, for the food that they find along them, which, when caught, used to be preserved by smoking, which were therefore denominated fumadoes by the Italians, to whom then, as now, we principally sold them, and which are still denominated fumades by the very populace of Cornwall, even when they are now preserved by pressing, had long ceased to range so high up the channel as St. German's, stopped their migration generally about Fowey, and so threw the whole fishery into the hands of the western Cornish*. This was the case within these few years, when a new movement was made in a government almost as revolutionary as the French republic's, and the pilchards began to range as high as ever up the channel, even up to Cawsand Bay, at the farthest extremity of Cornwall on the east. Yet even then the fishery was prosecuted, not in the bold mode in which it appears from Camden to have been prosecuted at St. German's formerly, and is prosecuted by the western Cornish at present, by taking the fish out at sea, but by managing a pilchard-seine as timidly as a ground-seine, dropping it in a kind of half-moon along the waters of the beach, and then by a rope at each end hauling the fish on shore; nor is it more than twenty-five years ago that the Cawsand fishers were obliged to procure nets, boats, and men from Vryan upon our own coast, for carrying on the fishery in the true manner again. The town of St. German's, then, was always little and petty in itself, even when its fishery was at the height; nor has either it or its fishery been affected at all by the alienation of its priory-lands to a secular family†, however it may be hereafter by the desertion of the site in summer for some water-drinking place, or by the exchange of its solitude in winter for the noise and amusements of London.¹¹

“quâ cùm pauculi sedissent episcopi,” &c. “hunc Germani viculum—; nihil enim aliud hodie est, quàm piscatorum viculus, qui satis copiosam exercent piscaturam in vicino oceano, Livero flumine præterfluente, et Tamara qui regionis est terminus.” In 1594, p. 126, the only variation is “piscatorum Casale” and “et proximis fluminibus,” the Limer being previously mentioned thus: “Liveria fluviolum—qui subluit S. Germans viculum.” In 1607, all is just as in 1594.—“Ædicula” in Camden here is translated by bishop Gibson, c. 21, “a little religious house,” and by Mr. Gough, i. 6, “a small religious house,” they fancy’ing it meant the priory, when it actually means the church, and when the words “in quâ cùm pauculi sedissent episcopi,” shew demonstratively it means so. But Gibson had made the mistake, and Mr. Gough had not power to correct it.

The only alienation which could affect either the town or the parish was one of a very different nature, one of a spiritual quality, one there-

* Gough's Camden, i. 10.

† “The marchantes that do deale in this comoditie” of pilchards, “as doe divers Londoners, vent them in sundrie places. In Traunc they utter their pickled pilchardes,” now not known but in domestic use, “and suche as they pack in hog-heades and other caske, wher they are receyved as a verie welcome reliefe to the sea-coaste of that kingdome, and from the coaste revented to their great profit in the inland townes.” All this trade into France is now gone. “The dryed ware they carrye into Spayne, Italie, Venice, and divers places within the Straytes, where they are very vendible, and in those partes tooke name fumados, for that they are dryed in the smoake” (Norden, 23): then they were principally vended, as now, in Italy—the name of fumados shews this.

fore too fine for the gross eyes of the generality, and never noticed by any of these authors, the diversion of the tithes from the maintenance of a clerical college here, to the support of another at a great distance; and the consequent deficiency of a competent maintenance for him who is now to take the charge of the parish. “The advowson of this parochial church,” says Mr. Willis, “—together with the rectory or impropriation, late the possessions of the priory—, valued at 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per annum, were granted by king Edward VI. to the dean and chapter of Windsor, in whose hands they now continue ‡.” When the lands of the priory were given away to Mr. Champernoun, the tithes of the rectory were reserved, with some view probably of doing that which common justice and common sense demanded, of restoring them to the church to which, in the person of the rector, they had belonged before the days of Athelstan, and with which they still rested in the appropriation of them to a college of clergy at it. Had Henry acted up to this view he would have done credit to his name, and blotted out one of the many enormities of sacrilege that now stand recorded in black characters against him on the doomsday book of history. But selfishness is a principle ever active in the heart of man; while the fear of sacrilege operates slowly within it, is examined cautiously by the reason, to see if there is no possibility in the wide regions of casuistry to escape from it, and is reluctantly admitted at last to exercise its office among us. Henry thus died with the tithes in his grasp, and sunk into the grave one of the first of human sinners, loaded with an accumulation of iniquities, each of which was sufficient to press a single head into perdition. The tithes, however, were resigned up by Edward, a young prince, whose principles were religious in themselves, yet whose understanding had not time, even if it had power, to unfold itself in worthy exertions; and whose understanding, whose principles were generally perverted by the ministers about him, all birds of ravage feathered under the wings of Henry, all ready, with an eagle’s swiftness, to fly upon the exposed body of the church; all eager, with a vulture’s violence, to rend it in pieces as their prey. Edward, however, resigned them up, not to their original and true proprietor, the church of St. German's, but to a clerical corporation at one of the king's own palaces. Thus the church, deprived of its college of clergy, with its half of the manor by the dissolution before, had now all the endowment of the rectory torn away from it for ever, and was turned out totally naked to the weather. While an ample income and an ample house were originally provided for its rector or its college, no income, no house remained for the curate. He has only a stipend at present, scanty in itself, yet even constituted chiefly by the mere fees of his personal offices; and only a house bequeathed him lately by accidental benevolence, but unfit from its poorness to admit the residence of any gentleman within it.

‡ Willis, 152; 153.

“The same bishop holds LANHERWEY. In the time of king Henry “it gelded for i hide, but yet there are iii hides there; the land is x “carucates; in demesne is i carucate, and iii servi and viii villani and “vi bordarii with iii carucates. There, is a pasture ii miles long and “one mile broad: formerly it was worth c shillings, now it is worth “l shillings. Fulcard holds it under the bishop*.” In the parish of St. Allen near Truro, was formerly a chapel dedicated, like the old church of the Romans at Canterbury, and like another of theirs at Whiterne in Galloway, to the honour of St. Martin, yet still preserved in memory by the names of St. Martin's fields, St. Martin's woods there. Local appellations are the common property of a whole neighbourhood, so become frequently unalienable by any length of time, and still continue steadily faithful to their original places, when even records have deserted them for ages. A house at it is denominated Lanher, in which, says Hals, “the bishops of Cornwall, and afterward the bishops “of Exon, had one of their mansions or dwelling-houses for many ages;” even “till bishop Voysey, temp. Hen. VIII.” constrained by that violence in the tyrant-father which the tyrant-daughter repeated when she swore in a letter to unfrock a bishop if he refused, “ leased these manors “ [this manor] to Clement Throckmorton, esq. cupbearer to queen “ Catharine Parre, from whom it passed by sale to Williams, and so “ from Williams to Borlase, by whom this manor or barton of Laner “ was left to run to utter ruin and dilapidation, having now nothing “ extant of houses but old walls, stones, and rubbish †.” Yet the name has no relation to the chapel, as Hals states it to have; saying “ Laner “ or Lanher, i. e. Templer,” was “ so called, for that long before that “ time,” the Conquest, “ was extant upon that place a chapel or temple “ dedicated to God *.” This he infers from the initial syllable of the name Lan, which ordinarily signifies a church, but originally signified only the churchyard, as it still signifies any enclosure in Yd-lan (W.), a rick-yard; Per-llan (W.), an orchard; Gwin-llan (W.), a vineyard; Cor-ian (W.), a sheep-fold; or Corph-lan (W.), a churchyard, because a burying-place; as it still signifies in many of the local appellations of Cornwall, Lan-dew within Lezant parish, or Lan-leake within St. Petherwyn; and, as it signified from the very first ages, in Medio-lanum, Croco-lana, Uro-lanium, or Veru-lam, the names of military enclosures within Britain and Gallic Italy. The name therefore is derived from another circumstance, and took its rise before the manor was ceded to the see, before the church of St. Martin was erected by the bishop as a chapel to his house. Lanher, notes Hals himself, was “ formerly in a wood or forest of trees ‡,” and the name testifies to the fact. Lann-erchr (W.) is a yard to a house, a void place, a green, a bare open place in a wood; Lanherch (C.) is equally a bare place in a wood, but thence ascends to import a wood itself, it standing in common acceptation at present for a grove or a forest §; and in this acceptation it is used here, Lanher-wen being merely Lanhere Guew, and referring to the first plain field that was made in the wood here ||.

* Fol. 120: “Idem episcopus tenet LANHERWEY. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida, sed “tamen sunt ibi iii hidæ. Terra est x carucatæ. In dominio est i carucata, et iii servi et “viii villani et vi bordarii cum iii carucatis. Ibi pastura ii leucas longa et unam leucam “lata. Olim c solidos, modo valet l solidos. Fulcardus tenet de episcopo.”

“ Richard

† Hals, 4.

* Hals, 4.

‡ Hals, 4.

§ Pryce and Richards.

|| “ Gew,” says Pryce, “ stay, support—. On many estates, especially in the west, “ one of the best fields is called the geus; probably from hence, as being the stay and sup- “ port of the estate.” This is a striking instance how unfortunate Pryce was in not adopting

“ Richard holds under the bishop THINTEN. In the time of king Edward it gelded for half a hide. Yet there is i [whole] hide there. The land is xl carucates. In demesne is a carucate and a half, with i servus and v villani and ii bordarii with iii carucates and i acre of wood. Formerly it was and now is worth xxv shillings ‡.” This I take to be the manor of Tinten in the parish of St. Tady, which was held by a family of the same appellation, in the 17th of Edward II. and in the 3d of Henry IV. *; but which has been long torn from the see.

“ The bishop himself holds LANGVITETONE. In the time of king Edward it gelded for iii hides, yet there are xi hides there. The land is xl carucates. In demesne are ii carucates, and vii servi and xxvii villani and xx bordarii with xxix carucates. There, are viii acres of meadow and e acres of pasture and x acres of underwood. Formerly it was worth viii pounds, now it is worth xvii pounds ‡.” This is the manor of Lawhitton, written Lanwitham before, and here written correspondently Langvitetone; originally, therefore, Lau-whitton, and all the words of Borlase's Vocabulary. There he would have found this very word, in its true orthography, and in its genuine signification, “ Guew, a plain field.” A field in my own parish is denominated the Guew. And “ from Agnes,” one of the Sylley Isles, says Borlase, 39, 40, “ we came across a bar of sand,—till we got to the Guéw, a part of Agnes, and never divided from it but by high and boisterous tides: here, on a plain, we found a large stone erect—, but at present there is neither corn nor field, this Guéw (in Cornish signifying a plain field) serving only as a croft or coarse common to Agnes.” Hence we see plainly, why “ on many estates;” not “ especially in the west,” but equally in the east, “ one of the best fields is called,” not “ the Gews,” but the Gcw; not as being “ the stay and support of the estate,” an etymology singularly harsh and violent! but as a plain amid the hills of Cornwall, and therefore “ one of the best fields” upon an estate.

‡ F. 120: “ Richardus tenet de episcopo THINTEN. T. R. E. geldabat pro dimidia hida. Ibi tamen est i hida. Terra est vi carucate. In dominio est carucata et dimidia, cum i servo et v villanis et ii bordariis cum ii carucatis et i aera silvæ. Olim et modo valet xxv solidos.”

* Tonkin's MS.

† F. 120: “ Ipse episcopus tenet LANGVITETONE. T. R. E. geldabat pro iii hidis, ibi tamen sunt xi hidæ. Terra est xl carucate. In dominio sunt ii carucate, et vii servi et xxvii villani et xx bordarii cum xxix carucatis. Ibi viii acæ prati et e acæ pasturæ et x acæ silvæ minutæ. Olim vin libras, modo valet xvii libras.”

now vitiated into Lawhitton, by that elision in speaking which I have previously noticed.

“ Rolland holds under the bishop LANDICLE. In the time of king Edward it gelded for i hide, yet there is i hide and a half there. The land is xii carucates. In demesne is i carucate, and iii servi and xiii villani and iii bordarii with iii carucates. There, are ii acres of meadow, and a pasture ii miles long and one mile broad. Formerly it was and now is worth iii pounds ‡.” This I apprehend to be that manor of Landegey, in the parish of Kea, near Truro, upon which the church was originally built, and from which, therefore, it carries the appellation of Landeleg, or Landegh, in the Valor of 1292, and of which, with the patronage of the living, the bishop is still possessed §.

“ Godefrid holds under the bishop SANWINUEC. In the time of king Edward it gelded for i hide. The land is v carucates. In demesne is i carucate, and ii servi and v villani and vi bordarii with ii carucates. There, is a pasture half a mile long and as much broad, a wood half a mile long and one quarter broad. Formerly it was worth xl shillings, now it is worth xx shillings ||.” This is apparently the manor of St. Wynnow, originally (we see) belonging to the bishop, but even at the Conquest held only under him, with a reservation of rent, merely half as much as the manor used to pay, merely twenty shillings when it used to pay forty, and, from the same power of violence that took it out of the bishop’s own possession, never raisable afterwards. The manor was

‡ F. 120: “ Rollandus tenet de episcopo LANDICLE. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida, ibi tamen est i hida et dimidia. Terra est xii carucatæ. In dominio est i carucata, et iii servi et xiii villani et iii bordarii cum iii carucatis. Ibi ii acæ prati, et pastura ii leucas longa et unam leucam lata. Olim et modo valet iii libras.”

§ Tonkin’s MS. an inquisition, 5 Car.: “ The manor of Landegey and Laner cum pertinentiis in paroch. de St. Key et alibi,” &c. In the Valor of 1292, the church appears called “ Landeleg,” or “ Landegh.”

|| F. 120: “ Godefridus tenet de episcopo SANWINUEC. T. R. E. geldabat pro i hida. Terra est vi carucatæ. In dominio est i carucata, et ii servi et v villani et vi bordarii cum ii carucatis. Ibi pastura dimidiam leucam longa et tantundem lata, silva dimidiam leucam longa et unam quadrantem lata. Olim xl solidos, modo valet xx solidos.”

then

then possessed by a family, that from it adopted the appellation of De San. Wynnoko. Thus Philip de San. Wynnoko was one of those who are specified in the 25th of Edward I. as holding twenty pounds or more a year in lands and rents within this county*. Leland calls “S. Winnous an abbate chirch,” as appropriated to the abbey of St. Peter’s in Exeter, now to the dean and chapter there; then adds, that “by the—chirch of old tyme inhabitid a gentilman, Joannes de S. Wynnoco;” and finally subjoins, that there “is much good wood at S. Ginoke’s†.” The manor, the church, and the parish, derive their common appellation from a saint of Bretagné, who, about 582, went into France, then a distinct kingdom, and into that part of Flanders which is now incorporated into France equally with Bretagné; established a monastery in the latter, at a place near Dunkirk, since denominated Berg St. Vinoc; and was adopted as a saint by the Cornish as well as by the Flemings‡.—But we now return to St. German’s again.

“FROM THE CHURCH OF SAINT GERMAN has been taken away i hidé of land, which paid by custom one cup of ale and xxx pence, in the “time of king Edward, to the same church §.” This is one of those jocular tenures that make such a figure in an antiquary’s view of our tenures, and exhibit the manners of our ancestors in a peculiar light; naturally grave in themselves, hardly ever sallying out into the vivacity of humour, yet even then sallying only amid the formalities of law, and in the cessions of property. But, what distinguishes this very strongly from the rest, it is certainly prior to most of them, probably prior to all, and confessedly Saxon in itself. “From the same church has been “taken away i acre of land, and it is the land of one carucate. From “the same church has been taken i virgate of land. Perlin [held all

* Carew, 52.

† Leland’s Itin. iii. 36.

‡ Usher, 533, &c. and Leland’s Itin. iii. 61: “Ex Vita S. Winnoci. ‘Quadanoecus, Ingenocus, Madocus, et Wenocus, Britones, monachi in Sithui monasterio, cui præerat “Bertinus’.”

§ F. 120: “De æcclesiâ S. Germani ablata est i hida terræ, quæ reddebat per consuetudinem unam cupam cervisæ et xxx denarios T. R. E. eidem æcclesiæ.”

“three] under the earl of Moriton. These were in the time of king Edward, within the demesne of the same church. Now Rainald and Hame hold them.” This completes the picture of Norman oppressiveness in Cornwall. In the insolence of a new-acquired sovereignty over the country, and in the exorbitance of unprincipled passions over the heart of the earl, he had laid his hands upon the very patrimony of the church, robbed the very God at whose altars he bowed, and defied the very thunders at which he shuddered. Such is the peculiar stupidity of sacrilege*.

But the record closes its whole account in this retrospective and comprehensive manner: “ALL THESE LANDS were held by bishop Leofric, in the time of king Edward †.”

We thus survey the list of those manors, which belonged to the bishop of Exeter before the Conquest, and were actually held by that

* “F. 120: “De eadem æcclesia est ablata i acra terræ, et est terra i carucatæ.” How “i acre of land” could be “the land of i carucate,” will naturally puzzle my reader to ascertain. But the passage proves an acre in Domesday Book, occasionally to be an acre in name only, and much larger than an acre in reality. Here an acre is declared equivalent to a carucate. But the very declaration shews it not to be so, ordinarily in the record. Here, and here only, as we have the declaration no where else in Cornwall; does the record adopt the Cornish largeness of measure, for an acre. “Every ancient Cornish acre,” Hals observes in p. 159, is “sixty statute-acres of land.” But Carew, 36, says, “commonly thirty acres make a farthing land, nine farthings,” or two hundred and seventy statute-acres, “a Cornish acre.” And “in the register of Lacy, bishop of Exeter, A. D. 1420, “the Cornish acre” is found far below Carew’s account, though much above Hals’s, even as it is found in Domesday Book; appearing to have “contained four ferlings, alias farthings, each ferling consisting of thirty acres, statute-measure,” and each Cornish acre, therefore, “containing—one hundred and twenty statute-acres” (Borlase’s Nat. Hist. 319), the very amount of a carucate. “De eadem æcclesia est ablata i virgata terræ. plinus [tenuit] de comite Moritonæ.” What does this figure or letter mean, p? We had it before under Bernerh, thus, “geldabat pro i hida p xxiiii libras,” where it obviously means per; and we have it here again, where I therefore suppose it to mean per again, forming the first syllable of the personal name, so leaving the second to begin without a capital letter. “Hæ erant T. R. E. in dominio ejusdem æcclesie, modo tenent Rainaldus et Hame.”

† F. 120: “OMNES HAS TERRAS tenuit Leoric episcopus T. R. E.”

very Leofric the bishop, who transferred his see of St. German's with all its possessions to Exeter. They therefore were plainly the possessions of his Cornish see. He particularly held the manor of St. German's, and the lands of the priory were in his manor; as being noticed under "the land of the bishop of Exceestre." But while we thus behold the first bishop of Exeter possessing the manor of St. German's, with a variety of other manors, as bishop equally of Exeter and St. German's, we find him not possessing a single manor, as bishop equally of Bodmin too. The property of the church of Bodmin is exhibited in the same form as that of the bishop of Exeter, but as totally distinct from it. "THE CHURCH OF SAINT PETROC," says the record, "holds BODMINE. "There, is i hide of land which never gelded. The land is iiii carucates. "There v villani have ii carucates with vi bordarii. There, are xxx "acres of pasture and vi acres of underwood. There S. Petroc has lxxiii "houses and one market. The whole is worth xxv shillings*." Not a single house in the town, not a single acre in the manor, does Leofric hold at the very manor and town, from which he derived one half of his double title as the prelate of Cornwall; and in which his predecessors have been hitherto believed to have had their sole seat originally. At St. German's he possesses the whole manor, at Bodmin he possesses not a particle of it. At St. German's he shares the very extensive land within the manor, equally with the canons of the church; at Bodmin he has no share with the church at all. At St. German's he has a regular demesne of ii carucates, with iiii servi and xxx villani and xii bordarii upon xvi carucates besides; but at Bodmin he has no demesne, no servus, no villanus, no bordarius, and no carucate. In St. German's he appears at home, at his see, at his palace; but in Bodmin he appears without a palace, without a see, without a home. I dwell the more circumstantially upon the point, because it has never been observed before, because it is the result too of all that I have previously remarked, and finally confirms the whole. The see of Bodmin, we now behold decisively in the mirror of Domesday Book, was not the original see of Cornwall, was never the sole seat of the bishop, was never the real seat at all; and at last, when it was associated with St. German's, became only the nominal, the titular, the conjunctive see of Leofric. Nor had Leofric one more inch of ground there for the endowment of his bishopric, than he had at any of the other churches in his diocese.

* F. 120: "ECCLESIA S. PETROC TENET BODMINE. Ibi est i hida terræ quæ nunquam "geldavit. Terra est iiii carucatæ. Ibi v villani habent ii carucas cum vi bordariis. Ibi "xxx acræ pasturæ et vi acræ silvæ minutæ. Ibi habet S. Petroc lxxiii domus et unum "mercatum. Totum valet xxv solidos."

In a seeming opposition indeed to this plain truth, "the manors of "Cargoll and Ryalton" have been said to be "given by our earls of "Cornwal before the Norman conquest, to the bishop of Bodman or "Cornwal, or the prior thereof*;" Lanher, in St. Allen parish, is declared to be "the capital messuage of the bishop of Exon's manor of "Cargoll, whereunto it is annexed†;" and "the great lordship and "manor of Ryalton, heretofore pertaining to the prior of Bodman," is declared to be "held of the bishop of Exon's manor of Penryn, and pays "yearly 10l. high-rent to the same; from whence I gather," notes an author, "that formerly both pertained to the bishopric of Cornwall, "afterwards concerted into Kirton and Exeter," with Kirton into Exeter‡. That all this, as an intimation of the endowment of our Cornish see previously to the Conquest, is absolutely false; we know from the roll of Domesday itself. There Cargau, there Ryelton are expressly specified, not as the manors of the bishopric of Exeter, but as entirely distinct from them, as exclusively the manors of Bodmin priory. "The church itself [of St. Petroc] holds RIELTONE," but "the earl of "Moriton—holds under S. Petroc CARGAU§." Ryalton appears from its name, to have been a house belonging to the king of Cornwall; claims accordingly a jurisdiction over the whole hundred of Pyder; has also a strong prison still attached to its ancient royalty; and shews a mansion-house, much beautified as well as enlarged, almost indeed re-

* Hals, 74.

† Hals, 4.

‡ Hals, 68.

§ F. 120: "Ipsa æcclesia tenet RIELTONE—; comes Moritonize—tenet de S. Petroc "CARGAU."

built, by that prior of Bodmin, Vivian, who died in 1533 ||. Yet this very manor, so plainly annexed to the priory, pays 10*l.* yearly (it seems) to the bishop's manor of Penryn. But it evidently paid nothing at the Conquest. It was not held then, either mediately or immediately under the bishop. It was held by the very prior himself. This we see at a glance, when we consult Domesday Book, when we behold Ryalton possessed by the priory, and find no payment accruing from it to the bishopric. Domesday Book indeed draws a strong broad line of distinction for us, between the ages antecedent and the centuries subsequent to it. Adhering to this line, we are not bewildered in the mazes of shifting property, but walk steadily with the clue in our hand through all the windings, and reach the termination of the whole securely. We particularly see the lands of the priory of Bodmin, and the lands of the bishopric of Cornwall, as distinct as the persons of the bishop and the prior; the bishop not having one atom of property in the lands of the priory, at Bodmin, at Cargoll, at Ryalton, or at any of its manors; yet possessing a manor at St. German's, sharing the lands of it in an even proportion with the canons of St. German's priory, enjoying even a part of his share as the demesne of his palace, and even cultivating it by his servi, his villani, his bordarii. At St. German's the bishop was demonstrably an inmate, at Bodmin he was absolutely an alien; and legal evidence is now superadded to historical ¶.

|| Hals, 68, 69, 20.

¶ Leland de Script. Brit. 61, says thus, as I have already noted in part, under i. 4: "Comes Moridunensis et Corinianus, frater uterinus Gulielmi Prinii, regis Angliæ, fanum Petroci prædiis spoliavit omnibus; Algarus nobilis, et Gulielmus Guarvestius episcopus "Iscanus, fundos—solicite in jus pristinum reduxerunt." But that this is all a slander upon the earl of Mortaigne, Domesday Book proclaims with a loud trumpet; reciting all the lands of Bodmin priory, as still to an atom nearly attached to it. Yet "Leland informs us," we are told by an author equally ingenious and judicious, but borne down by a testimony so weighty in itself, "that he seized—on all the lands belonging to the monastery of St. Petroc "in Bodmyn; the restitution of which, Algar, a nobleman, and Gulielmus Guarvestius, "bishop of Exeter, afterwards procured." (Some Account, p. 3.) Algar only rebuilt the church (Hals, 19); and "William Harleuist, bishop of Excestre, erectid the last fundation of this priory, and" instead of restoring, "had to hymself part of thauncient landes of Bodmyn monasterie." (Leland's Itin. ii. 115.)

Thus, however, was the bishop of St. German's, or (as merely entitled at last) the bishop of St. German's and of Bodmin, provided with an income fully proportioned to his dignity, and amply competent for his expenditure. The sound of the names of his manors indeed is greater to our ears, than ever his income was to his own purse. But then the mode of living at the time and the relative cheapness of the country, must have made a short income run out into a long expenditure. Nor had the prelate of Cornwall any reason to complain of the too restrained bounty of his sovereign towards him. "The lord bishop " of this diocese," says Hals (as cited by Dr. Borlase), from an estimate formed in 1602, " is lord of several manors and lands in Cornwall, worth " ANNUALLY, if they were not leased, TWELVE THOUSAND POUNDS*." Or, to cite the very words of the author immediately from himself, as more particular than they appear in Dr. Borlase; after a calculation of the respective values of our Cornish rectories and vicarages, formed much below their true values at present, as made " accordinge to the " computation of Edward Herle, of Prideaux, esq. anno Dom. 1602," who in the male line was descended from a Northumberland family, though in the female from a Cornish one †, and who, from his residence in Cornwall, had every advantage of information, is subjoined this conclusion: " Soe the bishop of Bodman [St. German's] or Cornwall, now " Exon, longe before the Norman conquest, as he still is, was possessed " of eight greate manors of land, by the bounty and piety of the earles " of Cornwall and kings of England, given and appropriated to his see; " viz. Cudan Beake, Lanwhitton, Lanher, and Cargoll, Penryn" given since the Conquest, as Domesday Book shews, " Burnear, Elerchy," of which merely the great tithes belong to the bishop, " Tregare," equally with those tithes given since the Conquest, as Domesday Book again shews for both, " and part of Pawton," the whole indeed, as Domesday Book shews once more; " the lands of all which, if they were not " leased, are worth ABOVE TWELVE THOUSAND POUNDS PER ANNUM ‡." The addition of several manors, which were donations posterior to the

* Borlase's Nat. Hist. 313, from Hals's MS.

† See i. 4, a note.

‡ Hals's MS. at the close.

Conquest, and which raise the episcopal revenue of course beyond its real height; is balanced by the omission of many more manors, which are specified by Doomsday Book as prior to the Conquest, and therefore ought to be taken into our account. These are Trewel, Matele, Tregel, and Thinten. But to these must be subjoined another, even Probus, given since the Conquest, as Doomsday Book finally shews, unaccountably omitted by Mr. Herle, and yet of so much value in itself, that the late bishop Ross got eight thousand pounds for the renewal of a lease upon it. Thus, if the patrimony of our Cornish bishopric at the Conquest is diminished by the subtraction of the posterior manors, it is also augmented by the addition of the prior; the reduced stream of endowment is again swelled to its full size; and at a gross estimate, in a general valuation, the revenue of our Cornish see may be still fixed, if the leases were annihilated that now exist, and that now produce perhaps not a tenth of the income, at the extended sum of TWELVE THOUSAND POUNDS A YEAR*!

* Gibson in Camden, c. 19, cites an inquisition, 9 Edw. II. which specifies the Cornish manors of the bishop of Exeter thus, “Lawhitton, St. German’s, Pawton, Pregaer, Penryn, and Cargaul.” The former of the marked manors should be Tregare, as in Hals above, situated in Gerens parish, and said by Hals, 138, to be called in Doomsday Book Tregara-du, which would very aptly signify God’s Tregare; but falsely said by him, as the name never occurs in the book at all. The mistake arises perhaps from another name, nearly similar in form, and therefore fancied to be the same in reality, Ragarad-due, read as Tregara-duw; yet one of the manors belonging not to the bishop, but to the earl. (See v. i. f. 124.) So he says, in p. 145, 146, concerning Penryn, that “this town—was a privileged manor—before the Norman conquest;” and that “by the name Pen-rin it was taxed, as the roke lands of a considerable manor, in Doomsday roll;” when it is not even mentioned in the roll. So he equally says, p. 8 and 140, that St. German’s is called there “Abbietown,” or “Abbie-tone,” or “Cudanwooid;” when we have already seen, that not one of the three names occurs in it. He adds too, in p. 7, 14, 39, 59, &c. that no Cornish saint is mentioned in the book, except St. Wene, or St. Wena; when St. Wenne is not mentioned once, and St. Mawan, St. German, St. Michael, or St. Stephen, St. Petroc, St. Achebrann, St. Probus, St. Carentock, St. Pieran, St. Berione, or St. Neot, with St. Constantine, are all mentioned expressly by name. So little can we depend upon any one reference to Doomsday Book in his accounts!

SECTION III.

NOTWITHSTANDING this ample endowment of the prelacy of Cornwall, the last prelate evidently complained of his income, as too scanty for his necessities or too diminutive for his merits. Leofric, whose affected timorousness and real avarice occasioned such an ecclesiastical revolution in our little empire, whose name is thus connected for ever with the internal history of it, but whose motives have never been held up to public reprobation before: though a Bretoon by birth, was “a man bred up and “taught among the Lorrainers,” as Malmesbury informs us*. He therefore introduced a custom from Lorrain, upon this occasion. He found the church of St. Peter in Exeter, the intended cathedral of Cornwall and Devonshire, appropriated to a society of monks. He considered monks as improper clergymen in attendance upon a cathedral. He therefore dislodged the monks, and placed what were then and are now denominated CANONS, in their room †.

The first monk was a hermit, renouncing society, and confining himself to solitude. This kind of life, however, presented such a dreary vacuity to the mind after a little experience, and impinged so strongly upon one of the first principles in the human soul, the ruling principle of communication; that it was soon exchanged, for a more comfortable sort of solitude. The hermit became social, and the hermitage expanded into a monastery. The moral principle of cohesion in man was not extinguished, as before; but the centrifugal power, if I may use the language, was now counteracted so far by the centripetal, as to produce a third from the union of both, that should be better than either. The love of society was to be indulged, but indulged so as not to break in upon religious retirement. Hence monks were incorporated into colleges, and, what is more wonderful, monks actually lived in families as mar- ried men. Even such monkery was confined entirely to the laity; the clergy having cures in villages or in towns, and being therefore precluded from monastic sequestrations. In time, however, monkery found its way among the clergy, as the collegiated monks were wildly obliged to be all ordained. Yet these were confined in their clerical offices, to the walls of their monasteries; and did not, as the genuine clergy did, engage in the parochial cure of souls†. Thus a distinction naturally arose between the latter, denominated the secular clergy, and the former, entitled the regular; those, as employed in the secular concerns of parish-cures; these, as living under the regulations of monkery. These particularly distinguished themselves now, by rejecting matrimony, and binding themselves under solemn vows of celibacy. Man can easily conceive a state of spirituality, which he can never realize. He thus proves himself to be designed for a higher rank in the creation, than what he can ever reach upon earth. He is unwittingly anticipating that “consummation” of his being, so “devoutly to be wished;” in which “we shall be as the angels in heaven, neither marrying nor “given in marriage.” Thus in the tenth century, when the cathedral of St. German’s first received an addition of a chapter to it, and in the eleventh, when the see of St. German’s was transferred, with that of Crediton, to Exeter, the clergy, who had been embodied so long at all the greater churches of the Saxons, in what were laxly called monasteries, as very early to lend those churches the actual appellation of *minsters; were divided into monks renouncing matrimony, and canons or (as they were still known by their original appellation at times) clerks, using or not using matrimony as they pleased, in common with all the laity. Thus also of the secular clergy in the church of Ely, prior to the settlement of monks at it, one of them is recorded by the historian of Ely to have been too curious, too much actuated by the spirit of a modern antiquary, in examining whether the remains, or the grave-clothes of St. Etheldreda, repositied about two centuries before in their † Bingham’s Ant. iii. 13-27.

* Malmesbury, f. 145: “Lefricus apud Lotharingos altus et doctus.”

† Malmesbury, f. 145: “Lefricus, cjectis sanctimonialibus a Sancti Petri monasterio, “episcopatum et canonicos statuit.”

* Sax. Chron. p. 40, so early as A. D. 669: ᾠνυπτερον το τῷμπριαννε. Hence York minster, Rippon minster, Wimburne minster, West-minster, &c. popularly among us to this day.

unburied coffin of stone, yet remained entire; to have thus taken a stalk of the fennel, that was growing in great abundance upon the pavement of the unroofed church, to have thrust it through a hole which had been made by a Danish battle-axe, and so touched her body; to have then introduced a candle's end at the point of the stalk, which dropped off upon the grave-clothes of the saint, and there burned out, without setting fire to clothes so damp; but to have finally shap'd the stalk into a crook, to have hooked the clothes, to have drawn them up to the opening, and to have cut off a slight particle from them; yet for these innocent, these antiquarian, these religious acts of curiosity, to have been miraculously punished by the saint, not indeed at the moment, but some time afterwards, as then "a very great plague invaded the house of that priest, which struck his wife and his children with a speedy death, and utterly destroyed his whole progeny †."

The first of these churches in monkery was the first in dignity, even the cathedral of Canterbury. The conversion of all England originating from Augustine and his brother-monks of the continent, he and they formed the first archbishop and the first chapter. All the archbishops afterward, in reverence to this fact, became monks (if they previously were not) before they were enthroned archbishops; and at last, below the Conquest, the monks trembled to receive William de Corbuil as archbishop, because he would not become a monk ‡. This establishment of monks in the metropolitan church of all England, must have greatly encouraged the settlement of them in the other cathedrals. Yet so strong was the prejudice of good-sense against them, that I know not any of our present chapters beside, to have been composed of them originally. Rochester, the second cathedral of England in point of time, which had Justus, recommended by Augustine himself to the see §; which had also “Ithamar,—an Englishman by birth, who “wanted nothing of perfect holiness in life, nothing of Roman elegance “in knowledge, the first who brought into his own country the ornament “of the pontifical honour in the person of an Englishman, and so lent some “dignity to his countrymen ||;” but which had equally Thobias, “who “had drunk deep of the knowledge of letters, even to an extreme satiety “of them, having not only the Latin but the Greek so familiar to him, “that he could express in them equally as in his own language whatever “he wished, and not less elegantly than readily *;” yet at the Conquest was merely “a church, miserable and empty, wanting every thing “within and without, as there were scarcely four canons in it †.” St. Paul’s cathedral, in London, cotemporary with that of Rochester in its erection, had Erkenwald for its bishop, about 675; and he, as Malmesbury remarks, “is considered in London as a man peculiarly holy, and “as meriting no little the favour of the canons; for his readiness in “giving them audience ‡.” York, the next cathedral in time to both,

† Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 602, 603: "Mox ingens pestis arripuit domum illius sacerdotis, quæ conjugem ejus ac liberos ejus citâ morte percussit, totamque progeniem funditus extirpavit."

‡ Bede's Hist. i. 23, "Augustinum et alios plures cum eo monachos;" Malmesbury, f. 114, "Nullum ad id tempus [Odonis] nisi monachili schemate indutum archiepiscopum fuisse;" f. 115, "Constat—monachos in ecclesiâ Sancti Salvatoris," at Canterbury, "fuisse a tempore Sancti Laurentii archiepiscopi, qui primus beatissimo Augustino successit;" and f. 125, "Willielmus de Corbuil,—defuncto Radulpho Cantuariæ archiepiscopo, in illum honorem evectus est, quem quamvis monachi trepidâssent suscipere quòd esset clericus," &c.

§ Malmesbury, f. 132.

|| Malmesbury, f. 132: “Ithamar,—Anglus quidem ortu, sed in quo nihil perfectæ “sanctitatis quantum ad vitam, nihil elegantie Romanæ quantum ad scientiam, desiderare; ita primus in patriam pontificalis honoris in Angli persona ferens gratiam, provincialibus suis nonnullam dignitatem adiecit.” Nennius, c. lxiv. seemingly asserts Egbert, made archbishop of York about 743 (Godwin, 656), to have been the first Englishman ordained a bishop; “Egbertus episcopus, qui fuit primus de natione eorum.” But as Bede, iii. 14, confirms the assertion of Malmesbury, concerning the English descent and the episcopal dignity of Ithamar; so Nennius must mean Egbert to be the first Northan-merion made a bishop, “de natione eorum,” while Ithamar was a Kentish man. (Bede, iii. 14.)

* Malmesbury, f. 132: “Thobiam scientiâ literarum (ut Beda dicit) extremâ satietate “imbutum, quippe qui non modò Latinam sed et Græcam linguam ita familiares haberet, “ut quodcumque vellet, æquè ut propriâ, non minùs faciliè quàm expediri præferret.” See also Bede, v. 23.

† Malmesbury, f. 132: “Ecclesiâ miserabili et vacuâ, omnium rerum indigentia [indigentia] intus et extra, vix enim quatuor canonici erant.”

‡ Malmesbury, f. 134: “Habetur—Erkenwaldus Londoniæ maximè sanctus, et pro “exauditionis celeritate favorem canonicorum nonnihil emulans.”

had equally its canons; Thomas, appointed archbishop in 1070, being “distinguished by elegance of person as an object pleasing to be contemplated, in youth enjoying a fine vigour and proportion of limbs, in age being ruddy, with a vivid glow of countenance, and white as a swan in his locks,—yet never aspersed by any sinister report of any violation of celibacy;—only throwing an air of sadness over his successors, by his liberality, by squandering away a great part of the episcopal lands, in too much prodigality (as is said) towards the clergy, and so attracting a clergy of competent incomes and learning around him §.” But to come towards Cornwall, Sherborne cathedral, that mother to Salisbury, had canons to the tenth century; when bishop Wilfsin “ejected the clerks from the episcopal church, and fixed monks “in their room*.” Yet the daughter-cathedral itself had clerks or canons afterward, “clerks distinguished by their literature,—canons more celebrated than any others for their literature and their music †.” Even Crediton cathedral appears from the conduct of Leofric, in expelling the monks from St. Peter’s in Exeter, and in replacing them with canons on his settlement of the cathedral in it; to have equally had canons itself. And the very cathedral of St. German’s appears, from a fact which I shall soon produce, to have equally had canons from the days of Athelstan, the founder of its chapter, to the days of Edward, the dissolver of it.

But, in the time of Edgar and Dunstaa, “the order of monks” was thought “not to neglect in any part of the country, a life emulous of § Malmesbury, f. 155: “Thomas,—elegantia personatus spectabilis, desiderio videntibus erit, juvenis vigore et æqualitate membrorum commodus, senex vivido faciei rubore, et capillis cygneus, liberalitate sua successores suos contristavit, ut qui multam episcopatum terrarum partem in clericorum usum, nimic (ut dicunt) prodigus, distraxerit, clerum sufficientem opibus et literis adunaverit;—cœlibatum ejus nunquam sinister rumor aspersit.”

* Malmesbury, f. 141: “Wilfsinus—in sede episcopali monachos, clericis rejectis, instituit.”

† Malmesbury, f. 142: “Clerici—literis insignes—; emicabat ibi magis quam aliàs “canonicorum claritas, cantibus et literaturâ juxta nobilium.”

“their

“ their profession; because they had rulers over them, religious in life, famous in knowledge, whom idleness did not make slow, or confidence render precipitate*.” A resolution was therefore taken up by the archbishop and the king, to change all the canons into monks, with or without their own consent; as such puritanism of principle did not admit much moderation in practice. “ The clerks of many churches,” says a monk, “ having the option given them, either to change their dress or abandon their preferment; gave way to better men, leaving their places vacant†.” So large and so resolute was the opposition of the clergy, to an innovation fantastical in itself, unnatural in its operation, and very dangerous in the experiment! For that very reason assuredly the experiment was not pushed on to any great extent at this period. The many churches, which I have already noticed as clerical or canonical; and the many more that I could notice‡, shew this. Such fortitude in resisting was sure to awe the soul of fanaticism itself, and to make it shrink into its cellula adiposa again. The monks indeed were frequently disliked by the bishops, even below the Conquest. Thus Walkelm, or Walkelin, who was nominated to the bishopric of Winchester by the Conqueror himself, “ being a foreigner, and new to the monks,” that had been violently thrust into the chapter a few years before§, and that must have been then unknown in their rigours to the continent in general, as confined to Lorraine entirely, “ hated the men ||.” Thus also, when John, bishop of Wells, “ a physician by profession,

* Malmesbury, f. 115: “ Ordo monasticus æmulam professionis suæ vitam per omnia loca non negligebat; propterea quòd haberent rectores, vitâ religiosos, scientiâ claros, quos nec desidia tardos nec audacia præcipientes faceret.”

† Malmesbury, f. 115: “ Clerici multarum ecclesiarum, datâ optione ut aut amictum mutarent aut locis valedicerent, cessêre melioribus, habitacula vacua facientes.”

‡ Malmesbury, f. 139, Winchester cathedral; f. 153, Worcester; f. 161, Gloucester; f. 165, Chester; f. 166, Oxford; and Florence, p. 417, Hereford.

§ Malmesbury, f. 139: “ Clerici episcopatus,—datâ optione ut aut vitam mutarent aut loco cederent, molliorem partem eligent s, exturbati sunt monachis introductis.”

|| Malmesbury, f. 140: “ Advena novus, monachos exosus.” Malmesbury represents him indeed, as afterwards altering in his opinion of them; “ facile correctus, umbratium illud odium sæpe deploravit, deinceps fovens eos ut filii, ut fratres, honoris et “ dominus.”

"profession, who had acquired no little fortune by his practice," being "a physician of high character, not for knowledge but for experience, as "fame (I know not whether truly or falsely) has reported," had transferred his see to Bath, in the reign of Rufus, and fixed it in a church of monks here; "he behaved harshly to the monks," says a monk himself, "because they were blockheads, and in his estimation barbarians; taking "from them all the lands that were to supply them with victuals, and "slenderly furnishing them by his lay-servants with a little food*." Just so we behold Leofric disliking the monks, at the equal translation of a see to Exeter; and with a bolder hand, because perhaps with a greater authority, sweeping them away from his intended cathedral at once†.

But the tide still ran so strong in favour of monks, with Leofric equally as with the nation; that he, with all his authority and boldness, bent before it, even while he resisted it; bent in reality, even while he resisted in appearance. The grand distinction between the clerk, the canon, and the monk, as I have repeatedly observed before, is the vow of celibacy

"dominos." Yet even Malmesbury allows, that he was still, "nihil minus, pro dissimilitudine vestis, exhibens eis vel adjutorii vel familiaritatis." And, as is well observed in Godwin, 213, "idonei certè sunt authores, monachos illum ubicunque data esset facultas" (vid. Eadmer, l. i. p. 10), "cœnobiis expulisse, et seculares presbyteros introduxisse."

* Malmesbury, f. 144: "Joannes—, professione medicus, qui non minimum quæstum illo conflaverat artificio,—medicus probatissimus, non scientiâ sed usu, ut fama (nescio "an vera) dispersit,—durè in monachos agebat, quòd essent hebetes et ejus æstimatione "barbari, et omnes terras victualium ministras conferrens, pauculumque victum per laicos "suos exiliter inferens." Nor was he the only bishop who had previously been a physician. We find a bishop of Durham, who had been the queen's physician; as the prior of Durham "fabricavit ecclesiam Dunelmensem de novo, adjuvante Nicolao Fernham episcopo Dunelmensi, prius reginæ medico" (Leland's Itin. viii. 12). Godwin, 741, 742, fixes Fernham's nomination to the see in 1241, the 25th of Henry III.

† A ridiculous tale is floating loosely in conversation at times, as if Bath and Wells were first united in consequence of a blunder; a divine being offered either Bath or Wells by James I. the divine in his acceptance pronouncing Bath as Both, both being therefore united jocularly in his person, and so continuing united ever afterwards. The union, we see, was actually made no less than five centuries before the accession of James. And let historians beware from this instance, how they engraft traditionary anecdotes upon the stock of history. Such anecdotes are generally, as here, the mistakes of ignorance, or the miscreations of fraudulence.

formally

formally made by the monk, and not made by the canon or clerk. But let me here prove the point again, for the further illustration of my present subject. A few years after the Conquest, pope Hildebrand, in a synod, “by a curse interdicted the clerks, especially those who were consecrated to the divine ministry,” some clerks being not clergymen, but the same as our parish-clerks at present, not ordained, yet subservient to clergymen in the offices of religion, “from having wives or inhabiting with women*.” The year following also, finding his interdict of no avail, or (in the words of the historian, another monk) “because the clerks chose rather to lie under an anathema than be without wives, pope Hildebrand, in order to chastise them (if he could) by the hands of others, commanded that no one should attend the mass of a married priest†.” This command, and that interdict, indeed, refer equally to the parochial as the conventual clergy; because the celibacy of the monk was now attempted to be forced upon every clergyman. The command of Hildebrand, therefore, ran in these comprehensive terms: “if there are any presbyters, deacons, subdeacons,” the clerks not in orders, as mentioned above, and the very fathers of our parish-clerks, “who lie under the guilt of fornication,” that is, of matrimony, now for the first time impudently and impiously denominated fornication, as forbidden by these ridiculous laws of man, though allowed by the very laws of God himself, though indeed appointed by the very system of his providence, and enforced by the very necessities of our original creation, in the transmission of mankind through a course of descents from a single pair; “we interdict them—any entrance into the church, even till they repent and amend; but if any choose to persist in their sin, let none of you presume to attend them as they officiate‡.” And “one Athelstan,” notes Malmesbury in that very language:

* Florence, p. 439: “Hildebrandus—papa, synodo celebrata—banno interdixit clericis, maximè divino ministerio consecratis, uxores habere vel cum mulieribus habitare.”

† Florence, p. 441: “Dum clerici magis eligerent sub tremati suopacere quam uxoribus carere, Hildebrandus papa, ut per alios (si posset) castigaret, præcepit; ut nullus audiret missam conjugati presbyteri.”

‡ Florence, p. 441: “Siqui sunt presbyteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, qui jacent in crimine “fornicationis.”

language of Hildebrand's monkery, which binds the incidental remark close to my present reasoning, "apostatized from his monkish dress, "despised celibacy, and expired in the embraces of a" wife, abusively called a "whore*." In this state of the human mind, when with the best intentions it was opening a way for the worst vices; when it was certainly introducing into the church, and placing at the altar, that very fornication with which it dared to charge matrimony; when religion was thus mounting to the sky in its balloon of fire and smoke, before it sadly found itself all in flames from its very means of mounting, and before it came hurrying to the earth again with destruction all around it; Leotric began a kind of mixed discipline among his new canons of Exeter, that should make them monks in reality, though canons in name, even more than monks under the very name of canons. He obliged them, says Malmesbury, "contrary to the manner of the English, but conformably to the custom of Lorraine, to EAT IN ONE HALL, to

"fornicationis, interdicimus—introitum ecclesiæ, usque dum pœniteant et emendent; si qui
"autem in peccato suo perseverare maluerint, nullus vestrum officium eorum auscultare
"præsumat."

* Malmesbury, f. 138: "Quendam Ethelstanum, qui—monachicæ vestis apostata, "celibatu contempto, in meretriciis amplexibus vitam effudit." Giraldus Cambrensis tells us, what sufficiently explains the opprobrious terms used here and before; "Notum "in Walliâ nimis est atque notorium," he cries complaining, "canonicos Menevenses ferè "cunctos, maximè vero Walensicos, publicos fornicarios et concubinarios esse sub alis eccle- "siæ cathedralis, et tanquam in ipso ejusdem gremio, focarias suas cum obstetricibus et "matricibus atque cunabulis in lavitibus et penetralibus exhibentes." But in another work he extends the complaint to England. An old clergyman there, he remarks, "ecclesiam filio "suo cesserat—presbytero—; filius autem, more sacerdotum parochialium Angliæ ferè "cunctorum,—secum habebat comitem individuum, et in foco focarium, et in cubiculo con- "cutinam," whom the old clergyman called "Filia," and who called him again "Pater." Accordingly he adds, concerning the Welsh, what appears, from his own account, to be equally true concerning the English, "ut sicut patres eorum ipsos ibi genuerunt et promo- "verunt, sic et ipsi more consimili prolem ibidem suscitant, tam in vitiis sibi quàm beneficiis "succedaneam; filiis namque suis, statim cum adulti fuerent et plenè pubertatis annos "excesserint, con-canonicorum suorum filias, ut sic firmiori fœdere sanguinis scilicet et affini- "tatis jure jungantur, quasi maritali copulâ dari procurant." Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii. 525, 526. So in Simeon Dunelmensis, 35, we see a clergyman noticed, as "non longè "ab urbe ecclesiæ habens," yet "uxori copulatus," and so leading "indignam sacerdotis "officio vitam."

"SLEEP

“SLEEP IN ONE DORMITORY ||.” This precluded all possibility of marriage. They could neither “have wives” nor “inhabit with women.” They took no vow of celibacy indeed, but were cut off from all use of matrimony. They were thus kept in the cage of celibacy, not by any bond of voluntary obligations, but by the much stronger bars and bolts of an imprisoning necessity. They were therefore acting really under all the rigours of monkish celibacy, even while they apparently gloried in their liberty under the appellation of canons. They were even doing more, and compelled to be stricter than the very monks themselves, some monks avowedly marrying; as Herbert the bishop, who transferred the see from Thetford to Norwich, and in 1096 began the cathedral at the latter, was known at the time, and is therefore declared by history without hesitation, to have had for his father, “Robert, the abbot of Winchester*.” Thus did that practice, which is known to have been universal in our conventual societies, begin first at Exeter, begin under the auspices of a continental divine, made prelate there, and begin by his introduction of it, not from the continent at large, not from France, not from Italy, those special regions of refinement to our isle, but from Germany, from the least refined part too of that unrefined whole, even from Lorraine! But, thus begun at Exeter, by Leofric, “the rule was transmitted to their successors,” adds Malmesbury, plainly implying it to be peculiar to this chapter of canons even then; “though, in the luxuriousness of the times, it has been in “some degree relaxed,” the good sense of the head revolting against this severity upon the heart. “But these clerks,” as Malmesbury, with equal impropriety and contradictoriness, calls them now, “have a “steward appointed by the bishop, who supplies them every day with

|| Malmesbury, f. 145: “Canonicos statuit, qui contra morem Anglorum, ad formam Lotharingorum, uno triclinio comederent, uno cubiculo cubitarent.”

* Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 407: “Et pater suus, Robertus abbas Wintoniæ.” Nor is this testimony to be eluded by what we learn from Malmesbury, f. 136, that the father became abbot by the simony of the son; as he equally became bishop himself, adds Malmesbury, by the same means, “etiam abbatiam episcopatumque nummis aucupatus.” The new abbot must have been a monk before.

“ the necessary food, and every year with the proper clothing †.” And in order to shew how rigorously this interdiction of female company was maintained among all the canons of our cathedrals, I need only cite the conduct of those at Durham in 1333. Edward III. came then to spend some days with the prior, as Philippa his queen came the day afterward. She, ignorant of “ the custom of the church of Durham, “ entered the gate of the abbey to the chamber of the prior, supped “ with the king there, and after supper retired to sleep there with the “ king. Then a monk intimated to his majesty,” who had not yet retired, “ that St. Cuthbert did not love the presence of women:” the king therefore went to tell the queen; “ the queen rose at the king’s “ command, in a petticoat only, covered with a cloak, returned by the “ gate at which she entered, and so repaired to the castle, beseeching “ the saint not to punish in wrath what she had committed in ignorance ‡.”

In this manner was the new chapter formed at Exeter, consisting equally of canons as the chapter of St. German’s, but of canons under the iron yoke of celibacy. The canons of St. German’s, in the mean time, escaped the hand of this wildly-reforming Lorrainer, who seems to have shared equally the insensibility with the covetousness of age, to have lost all his finer feelings in one crushing hug of avarice, and to have been thrown into a mental as well as moral kind of apoplexy by it: those of Exeter were like the monks or regulars, as I have already observed, and therefore denominated expressly canons regular; these

† Malmesbury, f. 145: “ Transmissa est hujuseemodi regula ad posteros, quamvis pro “ luxu temporum, nonnullâ jam ex parte deciderat; habentque clerici œconomum ab “ episcopo constitutum, qui eis diutim necessaria victui, annuatim amictui commoda, “ suggerat.”

‡ Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 760: “ Philippa—, ignorans consuetudinem ecclesiæ “ Dunelmensis, per portam abbathie ad cameram prioris descendebat, et ibi cum rege “ cenabat. Et cum cenâ factâ cubâset, intimatum est regi per quendam monachum, “ quomodo S. Cuthbertus mulierum præsentiam non amabat. Ad præceptum igitur regis “ surrexit regina, et in tunica solâ, co-operta clamide, per portam quam intravit rediit, et “ sic ad castrum se contulit, rogans sanctum ne quod ignoranter fecerat vindicaret.”

of St. German's were like the secular clergy, as I have equally observed, and therefore denominated as expressly canons secular. "The see and "SECULAR CANONS" of St. German's, says Leland, "were translated to "Exeter*." The canons, however, were still continued at St. German's, equally secular as before, and, like the parochial clergy, still maintaining their liberty unshackled by the fanaticism of monkery; they thus maintained it amid the growing encroachments of tyranny around them for more than one hundred years. In this interval of time the Conquest took place, and the fanaticism of Lorraine was carefully fostered by the hand of Normandy. William Warlewast, who became bishop of Exeter in 1107, and held the see twenty years, two before his death modelled that younger sister and once assuming rival of St. German's, the priory of Bodmin, into the form of the abbey at his cathedral†. So likewise "one William Warwick, bishop of Exceester," says Leland concerning the very same prelate, at Plympton in Devonshire, "displeasid with the chanons or prebendaries of a fre chapelle of "the fundation of the Saxon kinges," even of Athelstan himself probably, as I have formerly remarked, when I noticed the rectory of † Godwin, 401, 402. Leland's Coll. i. 75, 76: "S. Petrocus de Bodmyne or S. Aug. Ethelstanus rex monachos hic posuit primū. Postea introducti sunt canonici seculares. "Tandem verò canon. regular." The first assertion is not strictly true; the first members of the priory were only called monks, in that laxer sense by which all greater churches were called monasteries or mynsters: they really were what they were more justly denominated afterwards, canons secular. And of these it is that Leland speaks with all the bitterness of a real monk, derived with the mistake in point of fact from the succeeding regulars assuredly; "mortuis tunc ibidem monachis, in sortes clericorum," nicknamed as having children "heredipetarum, maxima pars reddituum cesserat." In "25 regis Henrici 1st," A. D. 1125, "quidam Algarus, cum conviventia episcopi Exon. Gul. Warwest, obtinuit "licentiam a rege, ut eadem ecclesia regul. dicaretur disciplina; quā obtentā, incepit ordo "canon. regul. et perseveravit in hunc diem. Cui episcopo rex fundationem hujus monaster. contulit, cum situ et terris vicinis." (Itin. ii. 115.) "There hath bene monkes, "then nunmys, then seculare prestes, then monkes agayn, and last canons regular, in "S. Petrokes church yn Bodmyne," when all the while there have been only canons secular and canons regular. So procreative is error! and so necessary is it for a modern antiquary to think as he moves, even when he moves with the best of the ancient antiquaries for his guides!

* Leland's Coll. i. 75: "Sedes et canonici seculares translati Exon."

St. Anthony in Roseland to be annexed to it, probably by Athelstan †, “because they would not leve theyr concubines” or wives, “found” means to dissolve their college §.” This forms a striking instance how forcibly this prelate applied to their passions, overcoming the honest instincts of nature, overpowering the honourable suggestions of morality, by a tyrannical appeal to their worldly solitudes. Accordingly we find that an archbishop of York, “soone after the Conquest,” got “the colledge [or priory] of St. Oswald,” at Gloucester, “impro-
“prieate to the seat of Yorke,” then “practized with the prebendaries “[to be] of a new fundation, and that they should be chanons regular;
“some were content, some would not, but the bishop brought his par- “pose to passe by power, and there instituted a house of chanons regu-
“ler ||.” But what glaringly marks the conduct of some at least among these wild reformers, that bishop of Exeter “had to hymself part of “thauncient landes of Bodmyn monasterie ¶ ;” and this archbishop of York “instituted a house of chanons reguler” at Gloucester, “impro“prieating benefices unto them, and giving them coyletts [or quilletts] of “land, reserving the goodly landes to the church of Yorke, that at this “tyme be yet possessed of it *.” These puritan prelates, in the midst of their zeal for heaven, attended carefully to the good things of earth, and took them from the very priories that were the objects of their zeal. So coolly selfish could they be, like our modern Quakers, under the very calenture of fanaticism! Yet their selfishness, let it be noted to their credit, was not of the gross, grovelling, and earthly kind. No! It was of a refined and delicate nature, such as never yet has been noticed in the history of man; they plundered not for themselves, not for their relations, but—for their churches, and so avoided all that consummation of guilt in robbery which we denominate sacrilege †.

At

† See v. 1, before.

§ Itin. iii. 45.

|| Itin. iv. 82.

¶ Itin. ii. 115.

* Itin. iv. 82.

† What “part” of “thauncient landes of Bodmyn” the bishop took, may seem impossible to be ascertained, yet is not; it appearing plainly to be that Cargaul, or Cargau, which in Domesday Book belongs to the priory, but in a record so early as the 9th of Edward II. is the property of the see, and remains the property of the see at present. (See the last section, a note at the end, and the text near it.) Even this I would gladly presume not to have been absolutely

At the end of this interval, however, Bartholomew bishop of Exeter, who was made bishop in 1161, and died in 1184†, came with all the monkery of his own and the other chapters, but with all the authority of the archbishop and the king, to model the priory of St. German's into the same form. "From a view to religion and piety," says the prelate in his charter of backward reformation, meaning very sincerely (I believe) the interests of piety and religion, but wandering wildly away (I am convinced) in the pursuit of them, "I have changed the church of St. German in Cornwall, which was acting with little of ecclesiastical strictness, and almost with a secular kind of laxity, into the life of canons regular‡." What this want "of ecclesiastical strictness," what this abundance of "secular laxity" really were, we are not now to be taught; we have seen sufficiently before, that the "laxity" means only the Christian liberty of marrying, and the "strictness" signifies merely "the doctrine of devils forbidding to marry." This doctrine was now established in full form of practice within the priory of St. German's, standing sternly victorious over all opposition, and savagely trampling human nature in the dust. Thus did a monkish celibacy go on under the compulsion of vows, or under the restraint of impossibilities; the conventual clergy being all (I believe) reduced beneath the yoke at last, but the parochial still struggling for their freedom, from the advantages of their position, and still maintaining it in spite of absolutely taken away by the bishop, to have been indeed taken only in exchange for another manor; as, while one of the prior's manors in Domesday Book appears to have passed into the possession of the bishop; one of the bishop's appears also to have migrated into the hands of the prior, Polton, alias Pawton, thus answering to Cargaul, alias Cargau. See the last section for Pawton. Yet Cargaul was certainly not taken in exchange for Polton, because they are both specified as equally the possessions of the see in the record of Edward II. See the last section in the note at the end.

† Godwin, 403.

‡ Leland's Coll. i. 75: "Ex chartâ B. episcopi Exoniensis tempore Henrici Secundi. "Ego ecclesiam S. Germani in Cornubiâ, parum ecclesiasticè et penè seculariter conversantem, in vitam canonicorum regularium, religionis et pietatis intuitu, converti." Bartholomeus episcopus Exoniensis, qui fuit familiaris Balduino archiepiscopo Cantuariensi. "Balduinus archiepiscopus Cantuar. factum approbavit.—Episcopus Exoniensis—canon. "reg. induxit auctoritate regis."

all invasions from their dispersion over the country §: till the Reformation happily came to restore the Gospel to man, and man to the Gospel; to free those who were peculiarly worthy to be free, and to replace nominal canons, but real monks with canons at once nominal and real ||.

Before

§ The parochial clergy continued to marry in defiance of all canons and interdicts, down to the Reformation. (Hist. of Manchester, iii. quarto, 458-460.) In them nature, as formed by God, and as conformed to Scripture, was in fact or in figure the “Pontem indignatus ‘Araxes’” of Virgil.

|| That much irregularity of practice might naturally be expected from, and would surely be imputed to, a compelled celibacy, we are ready enough to believe: accordingly numerous have been the protestant falsehoods that have passed current against the popish clergy since the Reformation: “I have seen in the Augmentation-office,” cries Burnet with authority seemingly decisive, “the original surrender of one of those houses,” in “which” the monks “confess themselves to have been guilty of sodomy, and other lewdnesses therein particularly named; and I know no reason they had to subscribe with their own hands to “such an accusation, if they had not been guilty of those wickednesses.” Why then were they not hanged upon their confessions? Only because they must have been tried, in order to be hanged, I suppose; and then the violence which had extorted the confessions, or the forgery which had fabricated them, would have been disclosed. “My lord of Sarum—in “particular—says, that Christ-church in Canterbury was represented as a little Sodom.” Here the charge becomes particular, and may therefore be refuted at once. On new-modeling the priory into a college, “there were eight prebendaries, ten petit-canons, nine scholars, and two choristers, being in all twenty-nine, admitted into this college, who had “been members of the dissolved priory; besides several others, as Dr. Goldwell and William “Wynchepe, who were marked out and assigned for prebends in this new church, but did “not accept thereof: others were preferred in other churches, all of them had pensions and “rewards.” If Burnet’s account be true therefore, Henry, the very charger of monks with sodomy, was equally the very patron of the sodomite monks. But, as “my lord of Sarum “has truly and fairly reported—all foul stories that could be found out were published, to “defame the religious houses,” and so to “give some colour to justify the pulling of them “down.” The man whose wealth composes his guilt, who has also power for his examiner, his condemner, and his confiscator, is sure to be found guilty; he will be made to confess falsehoods for his own crimination, either by the force of violence, or by the fraud of forgery. Thus “the priory of Christ-church in Canterbury,” so reprobated for an actual Sodom, “seems not in the least to have been guilty of any immorality or lewdness;” and indeed appears plainly to have not been, from the very rewards assigned the monks by Henry. In fact, “the prior—was a learned, grave, and religious man—; the convent “was a society of grave persons:” yet this very convent, and that very prior, are represented

Before this blessed event took place, the whole plan of Athelstan's provision for St. German's parish was superseded entirely; his college of clergy was turned into a society of fanatics, fanatics in fact, though not in will; too much puritans to engage in the secular, in even the spiritual concerns of the parish, to converse with women, to visit the sick, and to pray with the dying. These, if not the very offices of religion in the church, were actions indecorous for such prudish divines; all were certainly devolved upon some secular clergyman, as a deputy to the convent, now appointed to this church for the first time. The whole extent of revenue for all the members of the convent, even so late as the Reformation, was valued only at 243*l.* 8*s.* in all, and 227*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* clear*; but in the Valor of 1292, two centuries and a half before, it was rated merely at 10*l.*†. What proportion to either of these sums the allowance to the secular clergyman bore, we cannot ascertain; because no vicar was appointed with a stated proportion of the tithes, and the officiating divine was a simple stipendiary. Hence also we find not any secular divine appointed to the church, even a whole century after the introduction of monks into the priory, as late as sented by the effrontery of falsehood as forming a very Sodom. This representation, therefore, stands for all. See also Newcome's Abbey of St. Alban, 434. And I only add, that Burnet in the credulity of his weak mind, and in the malignity of his protestant spirit, says "these houses," in general, "became lewd and dissolute, and so impudent in filthiness, "that some of their farms were let for bringing in a yearly tribute" of whores "to their lusts." See Battely, 118, 119, 120. Monasteries were thus acknowledged bawdy-houses, like the one still seen in ruins at Pompeii, and shewing equally engraved in front that ensign of their business which has puzzled sir W. Hamilton, in Arch. iv. 169. Even another writer, and a writer entitled to no little share of reputation for the judiciousness of his ecclesiastical or political opinions, whom I may therefore, in his own language, characterize as the "celebrious" historian of Somersetshire (see the word in his i. 52, iii. 132), has carried the calumny so far, even without seeming to intend it, as to tell us that "in the friery at Ivelchester was born—Roger Bacon—" (Collinson, iii. 304.) Frieries thus appear again to have been made by the monks nothing less than lying-in hospitals.

* "The priory of St. German, in this deanery [of East], was returned by the commissioners to be worth, in temporal and spiritual property, the net annual sum of 227*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*" (Bacon's Liber Regis, 300.) See also Stevens's two volumes additional to Monasticon, i. 33, "Priorat. de Seynt Germain—, summa inde 243*l.* 8*s.*; summa clara 227*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*"

† Pope Nicholas's Valor, "Ecclesia Sancti Germani x li."

the

the Valor of pope Nicholas; even find none as late as the Reformation itself, and the very Valor of Henry VIII. ‡. The parish was thus thrown back in provision for its spiritual necessities, even in provision for its secular probably, as the want of personal intercourse with the parishioners must certainly have obstructed the current of charity from the monks, into the state in which it stood before the church was collegiate by Athelstan; and indeed into a state so much worse than that, as a stipendiary curate was less capable of charity than a rich rector: nor did the Reformation, which removed that exorbitant evil of compelled celibacy, remove this. The Reformation, we must confess with a sigh, was with the gross multitude, with the great vulgar as well as the small, little more than the selfishness of sacrilege, taking care to continue every abuse which would minister to its profit. It thus continued the fanatical practice of monkery, by seizing upon all the rectorial income as well as the conventual endowment, and so leaving only the popish curate for the church, with the popish stipend for him §.

But, at the original introduction of monkery into the parish, as great an alteration was made in the interiors of the conventual house as was in the canons inhabiting it. To shew this, I must take a survey of the house as it was disposed within, even down to the days of Mr. Willis. I shall thus lead my reader by the hand, walk with him into the rooms of a convent, not nodding in ruined walls over our heads, not deprived of its several partitions, and presenting merely one indiscriminated, one indiscriminable scene of confusion; but now or lately existing in much of its conventual form, with many of its conventual rooms, and with some even of its conventual furniture; all inhabited equally as in the days of its monkery, all preserved in a condition even more comfortable than in the very meridian of its splendour. Such a walk has never yet been taken by any author, and I glory in being the first to take it.

‡ Bacon, 302, "St. German's curacy."

§ Hals, p. 140, cites in form the Valor of 1292, for a vicar here at xl shillings a year: but this is all a mistake, as the vicar in the Valor belongs to Lanrake, named immediately before, and not to St. German's, named before Lanrake. He also speaks of the revenues "being, before the fifteenth of Richard the Second, wholly impropriated to St. George's chapel at Windsor, and only 14*l.* per annum deducted towards the maintenance of the "two vicars to serve the cure;" when the tithes alone were, when even these were not given till the days of the Reformation, the reign of Edward VI.; and when no provision was made at the time for the maintenance of two vicars, of one vicar, or of a mere curate: the provision has been made since, the church of Windsor charging its tithes with a voluntary payment to the curate every year.

The house is handsome, large, and lofty, turning its front to the river, and presenting its back to the church. The front is composed of a narrow body, and two wings projecting broadly from it; the back is nearly all flat: but this being built close up to the tall bank, on which the parsonage once stood, and the church still stands, the offices are all upon the ground-floor, and the first floor is level behind with the surface of the bank. From that bank we enter into what was still denominated THE GREAT HALL, in Mr. Willis's time; then extending over the two bed-rooms, with their dressing-rooms, &c. on the right or left, and with them forming originally the dining-hall of the prior, his eight brethren, their officers occasionally with them, and their servants after them; just as we see still practised in the halls of our colleges at Oxford upon those gaudy or festival days which shew us the ancient modes of collegiate dining in their fullest form. So our kings at their coronation dine in the old hall of Westminster, because it is the hall of their old palace there, and because they used to dine in that, when they resided in this. So "the great hall at Eltham," in Kent, "probably built by Edward II. was also the common dining-hall of that palace; and is in point of magnificence and unpolished grandeur but little inferior to that at Westminster.—The several kings, Richard the Second, Henry the Fourth, Henry the Sixth, and Henry the Seventh, resided at this palace very much: and it appears from a record extant in the office of arms, that even the last of them most commonly dined himself in the great hall, where his officers also had their respective tables*." On this account also was it that the windows of these halls were decorated so much with paintings on the glass. "The high-fancied architects of our ancient churches," says an ingenious gentleman in a manner peculiarly ingenious. “ probably never thought of erecting a place for religious worship, without giving it the devotional glow of painted glass. “ Whether our ancestors judged as well in painting the windows of their “ halls with coats armorial, may admit of a doubt. If we consider them “ as entrances to [rather principal parts of] their stately mansions, the “ richness of coloured windows has a good effect; but there is a gloom “ belonging to them which seems not to suit well with apartments of “ convivial festivity*.” Our ancestors were a serious, thoughtful race of men, and therefore loved to see the “ dim religious light” diffused over their dinners as well as their prayers; they kept up all the forms of domestic devoutness in their houses; the chapel, the chaplain, and the graces at meals; even their “ convivial festivity” was thus tempered with religion in design, whatever it might be in practice; the habits of their minds were religious, however they might occasionally deviate from them in acts; and their halls, which were their daily dining-rooms, which therefore resounded daily to the voice of prayer before and after dinner, analogously received through the paintings on their windows, a light softened down into a shade, that, like the moon’s veil of light, at once obscured and set off the whole. This principle we find carried to such a luxurious and prodigal extent in one instance, that the lord who erected Sudeley castle in the reigns of Henry V. or VI. actually glazed the windows of the hall with those transparent gems the BERYLS, which must have cast from their small, roundly flat, but irregularly disposed faces, a deeper kind of “ visible darkness,” a “ light” made more thoroughly “ to counterfeit a gloom,” in the tinge of blue and green reflected together upon all within†. But to descend in our

* Arch. vi. 366.

* Some Account, 9, 10.

† Leland’s Itin. iv. 75: “ One thing was to be noted in this castle,” of Gloucestershire, “ that part of the windowes of it were glazed with berall;” viii. 32, “ the hawle of Sudley “ castle glazed with rownd beralls,” not beryl-crystals, called simply beryls by our lapidaries at times, because these are always columnar in their form, but actually beryl-gems; because the beryls of Sudeley castle are said expressly to be “ rownd;” and because beryl-gems, though most commonly columnar like the crystals, are yet at times in the form of a round pebble. These gems are brought from India, from Peru, and from Silesia; the worst from the last. “ The lord Sudeley that buildid the castle,” says Leland, and thus accounts unconsciously for the beryls, “ was a famous man of warre in king Henry 5. and king Henry 6.th

“ dayes,

our assimilation of manners, so as to come nearer to the level of a priory, we find even in 1669, and at the palace of Lambeth, the company that came early to dine with the archbishop were shewn into the gallery, and entertained themselves in it till the archbishop came, “when they all went down with him into the common hall, where “were divers bishops and persons of quality;—and—there was a high table [which] went across the upper end of the hall, and tables on each side, as in college-halls*.” But this mode of dining every day in public began to be disused by some a few years before; grandeur retiring from the wearisome pomp of a dining-hall, to repose in the ease of a private eating-room; and at the earl of Worcester’s, in the reign of the first Charles, but before the Rebellion, the gates of Ragland castle (that castle which is ever memorable for the gallant defence of it by this very nobleman afterwards) being shut at eleven, the tables were laid “two in “the dining-room” for my lord’s family, his noble or his knightly guests, “and three in the hall” for inferior guests, gentlemen-waiters, or pages†. Such, therefore, were the original uses of this hall at the priory of St. German’s; then not glazed indeed with beryls, but decorated with paintings, probably in the windows! It then was very large and ample in its dimensions, extending the whole length of the house behind; but it has since been curtailed in its proportions by the innovations of man-

“dayes, and was an admirall (as I have heard) on sea; whereupon it was supposed and “spoken, that it was partly,” in the windows of the hall, “builded ex spoliis Gallorum” (iv. 75), or, as viii. 99, says more particularly, “Sudeley castle—was builded, as it is “there commonly spoken, ex spoliis nobilium bello Gallico captorum.” But beryls seem to have been more frequent formerly in this island than they are even at present. So, among the articles stolen from convents and churches by Henry VIII. and delivered to him all in one day, is “a monustrance of silver and gilt, garnished with counterfeit stones, with two “great glases of Lyrrall in the middes, a small chest of reliques for showing them to the “people,” and “another monustrance silver and gilt, garnished throughout with great “lyrralls,” and “a cup of Lyrrall garnished with silver, and two candlesticks of lyrrall “garnished with silver.” (Stevens’s Additions to Monasticon, i. 85.) So, likewise, of the effects of the attainted sir Adrian Fortescue, is “a pair of candlesticks of lyrral, garnished “with silver.” (Ibid. ibid. 84.)

* Arch. vi. 369, 370; and Wood’s Life, 221, 222, in v. ii. of Lives of Leland, Wood, and Hearne, Oxford, 1772.

† Arch. vi. 370.

ners or the variations of taste, and has thus been reduced very considerably in its size.

On the northern side of that apartment is a smaller one, which, in an anticipation of modern refinement from the mere desire of religious sequestration, was afterwards made what it was very recently denominated, THE DINING-ROOM of the priory, now called the eating-parlour, with "a bow-window of ancient work" in it, at Mr. Willis's visit to the house. That room was apparently an original part of the priory, as the priory must always have had such an appendage to a mansion-house, for the reception of its whole family to dinner: but this was certainly constructed by bishop Bartholomew, when he converted the canons secular into regular canons; discarded the pomp of dining in public, so obliged them all to eat in one room, smaller in size, more retired in site, and wholly appropriated to themselves. It was accordingly remembered by an old man lately in that ancient condition, which the great hall must have once presented in its aspect, and which the hall of a college at Oxford still presents; a round grate for a fire stood in the middle, and the cupola for the discharge of smoke from it still shews its mouth in the ceiling, closed with a circular board painted. "One thinge I mucche notyd in the haulle of Bolton," says Leland concerning that castle in Yorkshire, which was for so many years the prison afterwards of the injured Mary queen of Scots, "how chimneys were "conveyed by tunnells made on the syds of the wauls bytwixt the lights in the haulle; and by this meanes, and by no covers," that is, by no cupolas covering the vents in the roof, "is the smoke of the barth in the hawle "wonder [wonderous] *strangely conveyed." This is the first intimation in all our historical notices of our present chimnies; it is therefore very valuable in the history of manners, and for this reason we ought to ascertain the date of the chimney, if we are able to do so. We are able, even from our very informant, as we know the castle itself to have been built by "Richard lorde Scrope,—chauncelar of England in "Richard the 2. dayes—. It was a makyng xviii yeres, and the chargys

* Iun. viii. 19.

“ of the buyldynge cam by yere to 1000 marks*.” The modern chimney, therefore, was first formed in England between the years 1377 and 1399. Yet whence was it derived into England? From Normandy beyond all doubt; it actually appears in Normandy within a hall erected before the Conquest, and used for a grand dining-room by the Conqueror while only duke of Normandy. “ On the north sides” of the great guard-chamber, within the old palace of William at Caen, Dr. Ducarrel tells us in terms, but means assuredly both the north and south sides, “ are two magnificent chimnies in good preservation †.” Thus does our present disposition of chimnies appear, though Dr. Ducarrel passes over the evidence with an unnoticing pen, to have been practised even by the Normans prior to their descent upon our island; they of course brought the disposition with them; yet we do not find it used in any of our halls before the builder of Bolton castle copied it: even so late as 1540, Leland shews us in his admiration of the chimnies, that the disposition was then very rare in England, and not known by him to exist any where else. The disposition, in fact, was not adopted within our college halls, even nearly to our own times; and, in one of them at Oxford, actually to our own: all our halls there, though altered upon the plan of Bolton castle, that first-known house of the whole kingdom for lateral or tunnel chimnies, still shewing (like the dining-room at Port Eliot) that they had very lately none but the cupola chimney.

At the head of the dining-room was a raised platform of boards along the whole, with the bow-window above mentioned at the higher or northern end of the table, for receiving a sideboard into it: the bow-window is now destroyed, but some slight remains of its “ ancient work” are still visible on the wall without. And this sort of window, so frequent in the grander rooms of our ancestors, has been recently adopted by ourselves for the pleasing ornament of our own parlours or our own drawing-rooms ‡. In that window, says Mr. Willis, are “ these arms in a—shield, viz. argent, three bells, or, which I con-jec-

* Itin. viii. 13.

† P. 59.

‡ It was formerly called a compass-window. See Leland's Itin. i. 107, &c.

ture to have belonged to Robert Swimmer, last prior of this monastery," and the only one that he knows, "in whose time this window is supposed," by whom? "to have been glazed; and in all probability that part of the house built, and these arms then put up*." This "part of the house" was certainly built by bishop Bartholomew, and his arms are certainly to be expected in the window. Other arms, indeed, have been given him, but given by an author who has annihilated his own credit upon the point, by asserting his sepulchre to be in Exeter cathedral, and so leading us to suppose he saw the arms at it†; though where he died, or where he was buried, is utterly unknown‡. The arms naturally refer to the building, and the erector of this has a natural claim to those; they were his own family arms, I believe, and not united with the arms of his see, probably because he erected it, not from the revenues of his bishopric, but from the funds of his private fortune. This reason will account satisfactorily, I think, for omitting the arms of the see; and the omission we shall soon find repeated again, in the arms of an undoubted bishop painted upon this very window. Of bishop Bartholomew, therefore, we may with some improvements say justly, what Mr. Willis, in the mere temerity of ignorance, says of the only prior known, that the former is the man "in whose time this window is supposed," on the best grounds of historical analogy, "to have been" made and "glazed;" and not merely "in all probability," but clearly, certainly from the very conversion of the canons secular into regular canons, "that part of the house built, and these arms then put up§."

On the western side of this dining-room is what was denominated to the days of Mr. Willis THE PORTAL||: it was the original portal of the priory, and actually formed the grand entrance into the house within

* Willis, 149, 150.

† Izacke.

‡ Godwin, 403.

§ Willis, 149, 150: "In the dining-room, which you enter at the north side of the great hall,—in a bow-window of ancient work, yet remain in painted glass—these arms." &c.

|| Willis, 149: "In the dining-room,—are several arms of the matches of the Eliots, painted in the portal."

these few years; a flight of stone steps mounting from the court in front, and leading up to it. But, as the back-front has become the principal one, the steps have been removed, the doorway at the head of them has been turned into a window, and the portal has been trans-nominated into the saloon.

On the eastern side of the dining-room, and in the range of the eastern wing, was what has been lately rebuilt upon the old foundations, and is intended to be the best eating-parlour and the best drawing-room. In apartments of so modern an appellation, I believe, had the monks THAT COMMON DORMITORY, which bishop Bartholomew must have built at the same time with the dining-room, as he made it equally necessary with this to the completion of his new establishment. At the northern end of the wing, the prior is known from tradition to have had his lodgings; and, in forming a water-closet, a little without the dining-room, on the east, was found a passage to his cellar below, that had been long disused and at last forgotten. The monks, we may therefore presume, had their dormitory near, in what is intended to be the best eating-parlour, the southern end of the wing. But, as the nature of monastic dormitories is almost wholly unknown to us, and as our only dormitories at our great schools are somewhat different from these, let me give my readers a peep into one of them, that of Oseney abbey, near Oxford. “It was a long room, divided into several partitions,” says Wood, in manuscript, from the records of the abbey; “in every one of which [partitions] was a bed.—Every one had his bed to himself, and that also open at the feet towards the common passage, that the præfect, as he went by, might see whether each kept his place.—After every one of them was reposed, there was a candle set up, to burn for the most part of the night, or at least, to serve till the time of performing their nocturnes—; the candle being lighted, the keys—were carried to the præfect, or his vicar, by the servitour belonging thereto, and by him again [the doors were] at the appointed time opened; then each monk, receiving their summons to rise, had half an hour or thereabouts allowed them, both in making up themselves
“and

“and *their beds.” This gives us a full view into the inside of our own dormitory; even after it has ceased to exist. Yet let me add to the view in this little-explored region of antiquities, what may serve to complete it; that “the monks” at St. Austin’s in Canterbury, had each of them only “a mat and a hard pillow to lie down upon, and a blanket or rug “to keep them warm;” that “they slept in their clothes, girt with girdles, “and thereby were” sure to suffer in their health, that they might be “always ready to attend their night-devotions†.” But, as the dining-room was called in some monasteries the fratria, the fratry, or the frayter-house; so was it placed, as here, close to the dortor, as the dormitory was equally denominated. Thus “the fraterie” at Canterbury, “in Mr. Somner’s manuscript-book called the fratria, was the refectory or dining-room of the monks;” in 1547, the lead, timber, and other materials “of the late frater-house,” were given to one of the new prebendaries for the erection of a prebendal house; and another prebendary received an assignment for his house, of the whole lodging “through the fraterie “to the cloister, and all the fraterie to the dortor-wall‡.”

Just by this fraterie, as we see from a drawing of the convent at Canterbury, made even in the twelfth century; was the LOCUTORIUM or PARLOIR §. This was a constant appendage to all our convents, and is at present to all abroad; the very original of parlours, in our own houses ||. Yet it did not, as at first we are inclined to suppose it did, answer to the common or combination rooms now used in our colleges at Oxford and Cambridge; as not being the apartment in which the monks met

* Stevens’s Additions to Monasticon, ii. 121.

† Battely, 96.

‡ Gostling, 175; so in Leland’s Itin. iii. 119, the fraterie at Glastonbury.

§ Gostling, 175.

|| How old these are in our own houses, I know not; but see them in Leland, and suppose them not very old. In Itin. ii. 34, we read of “the maner-place of Ewelme,” in Oxfordshire, that “the haul of it is fair, and hath great barres of iren overthwart it instede “of crosse beames; the parler by, is exceeding fair and lightsum.” In iii. 83, we find, that the genealogy of a family “be yn glass windows in a parlow, in the maner-place at Est “Lilleworth.” And at Salisbury “bishop Beauchamp made the great haulte, parler, and “chaunbre of the palace.” (iii. 97.)

together,

together, engaged in conversation, and displayed their learning, their liveliness, or their amiableness, in a free communion of souls. Society was not cultivated so much in those days, as in these; and that genial current of the soul, conversation, was generally frozen up by the cold rigours of discipline in monasteries. Even our locutoria in the universities, appear to be all extraneous to their original institutions, and in many of the colleges the very rooms are mere appendages to the original buildings. Yet the natural force of the current was so great, that it defied all the rigours at times, flowed on unarrested by the icy hand of this artificial winter, and vented itself into reservoirs very nearly similar to those in our colleges. We know the outbreak from the repulsion. “That parliament,” says a rule in 1238, using for the intercourse a name peculiarly dignified in its sound to our ears at present, “which in some cloysters of Benedictines hath been accustomed to be held after dinner, is to be interdicted wholly*.” The monastic parlour, indeed, was destined merely for any casual intercourse between one of the members of the society, and such of his relations or intimates as called upon him. This is evident from the monastery of Abingdon, which (like ours) had no cloyster, but “near the gate had a room for a parlour, in which the monks conversed with their acquaintances and friends, if they happened to come†.” Here we see the parlour “near the gate” at Abingdon, as we have previously seen it “just by the frater” at Canterbury; and these two positions unite to fix our parlour in the portal, at the door of the house, and by the side of the dining-room.

But canons regular were also obliged, like monks, to perform nightly offices of religion in the church. Their very appellation of regulars, indeed, resulted principally from their observance of the regular hours of prayer by night and by day ‡. Those hours were nine in the evening, twelve at night, three in the morning, and six. And as we have just seen the very canons of Oseney abbey, when laid in their beds, having “a candle set up” in the dormitory, “to burn for the most part of the night, or at least to serve till the time of performing their nocturnes ;” so we may further see the canons of Ely, “having just made their procession to church in the night, having just returned into their dormitory, “and a few of them just entered their beds,” when the bell-tower fell down upon the quire §. This was therefore a performance, for which a common dormitory seems to have been almost equally calculated, as for the preclusion of matrimony. Yet the going for this purpose to the church, however near, must have exposed the persons of our canons dangerously, to winds, to rains, or to snows; thus aggravating a discipline already very severe, into a rigour intolerable in itself. For this reason, even that fond presumption, which hoped to raise the body in its present state, into a superiority over half the demands of nature; would be obliged to shrink a little in its views, to make its philosophy bend a little to sensation, and to form a CHAPEL within the priory for these devotions.

* “Parliamentum, quod post prandium in quibusdam [Benedictinensium] claustris fieri consuevit, penitus interdicatur.” (Newcome’s Hist. of St. Alban’s Abbey, 13., 14, 536.)

† Monasticon, i. 98: “Nec habebant clausum—sicut nunc habent—pro claustro;—habebant juxta portam domum pro locutorio, in quâ cum notis suis et amicis, si forte venissent, loquebantur.”

The original language of Italy has stamped itself in a thousand signatures, upon the languages Celtic and Teutonic of this island. The extension of the Roman victories, the diffusion of the Roman refinements, the conveyance of Christianity from Rome to the Britons, and the conveyance of it from Rome to the Saxons again; have all united to fix those signatures deeply on the present dialects of Britain. But the language of religion has them imprinted most deeply; every appropriate term in it being apparently Latin. Hence our chapel is only the capella of the Romans, is even their capsella, freed from the sibilating letter,

‡ Ingulphus, 500, speaking of some who came with him to the abbey, yet were “rigorem religionis abhorrentes,” he adds; “hos omnes—ad orientalem partem monasterii “manere jussit—; fabricansque, illis ibidem capellam, horas regulares tam nocturnas quam “diurnas tempore quo monachi persolvebant, et ipsos persolvere jussit.”

§ Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 643: “In nocte—facta—processione—, et conventu in “dormitorium regrediente, vix paucis fratribus in lectalis ingressis.”

and therefore signified originally a mere case for relics. Thus an ancient author mentions “a silver capella,” or chapel, “in which was a portion of relics ;” as an ancient formulary orders some persons to swear, “upon the chapel of sir Martin,” the shrine of a saint by the courtesy of some university in the collation of a bachelor’s degree created a knight *. Such a shrine is described in the tenth century, as a “capsa” or case “of solid gold,—stored with the choicest relics, and “modelled in the form of a chapel †.” But what was this form? It was merely the figure of our Saviour upon the cross, with relics reposit within the one or the other. A prelate of Ely, even as late as the reign of Stephen, carried with him in a journey “a very fine chapel which “was taken out of the church :” but was “a silver cross,” made by Brithnod, the abbot in the tenth century, “on which the body of our Saviour was, by an ingenious artifice, left hollow, to contain the relics “of the saints Vedastus and Amandus ‡.” But the appellation of chapel soon ascended much higher, and fastened on all the other furniture of a “sacellum ;” the principal communicating its own appellation to its subordinates. Thus Charlemagne is said in his will to have ordered his “chapel, that is, his ecclesiastical ministry, which came to him by “inheritance, to be preserved whole ; excepting whatever he himself “had added to the same chapel, in vessels or in books, which who would “might buy §.” From relics in a “sacellum,” however, the emigrating

* Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 633 : “Capsam cum dente S. Petri.” Spelman’s Glossary : “Evodius de Miraculis S. Stephani, lib. i. ‘Capella argentea, in quâ erat reliquiarum portio.’” Marcul. lib. i. formul. 38 : “Super capellam domini Martini.”

† Spelman : “Ekkehardus junior, qui obiit anno 996 ;—‘Capsa solidè aurea,—reliquiis summis referta, in formam capellæ creata.’” These “capsæ,” or cases, were so finely engraved, that, as the word forms chasse in French for a shrine, so has the thing produced enchasser to enchase.

‡ Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 622, “Capellam optimam, quam—de ecclesiâ tulerat [Nigellus] ;” and i. 606, “Crucem fecit argenteam,—in quâ forma corporis Christi, ingenio artificis cavata, sanctorum reliquias Vedasti et Amandi continebat, quam Nigellus episcopus de ecclesiâ asportavit.”

§ Florentius, 284 : “Capellam, id est ecclesiasticum ministerium, quod per hæreditatem sibi venit, integrum servari decrevit ; exceptis siqua ipse capellæ eidem in vasis aut libris addidisset, quæ qui vellet emcret.”

name very naturally passed to the "sacellum" itself, and so completed its progress. Durandus repeats with a tone of dubiousness from others, what is certainly true in itself, and highly to the honour of the parties, that "anciently in military expeditions, a small room was formed in a tent," the general's tent, "and covered with goat-skins;" that "within this was mass celebrated, and to this was the name of chapel given ||." An incident of history, of early history, of our own, reduces this intimation into reality, and exhibits the reality in its full lustre. The great Alfred, in the ninth century, "commanded his chap-lains," says Asser, his cotemporary, "to keep candles burning day and night before those holy relics of many of God's elect, which always accompanied him wherever he went; though the candles were exposed to the blowing violence of winds, through the thinness of the tents ¶." Here then we behold relics attendant upon the king, and attendant under the cover of a tent. But we find the evidence of Asser consummated, by a writer of the fifteenth century; Rudborne expressing the same command with greater brevity, yet with fuller explicitness, thus, "he placed a candle of twenty-four divisions in his chapel *." A most memorable event in the private life of Alfred, is thus explained satisfactorily for the first time. But we may illustrate it and our subject by more incidents of a similar quality. "Amberbachius testifies," cries an author who never thought of this application of the testimony, "that

|| Spelman: "Durandus in Rationale, lib. ii. cap. 10:—'Sunt qui dicunt, quòd antiquis, in expeditionibus, in tentorio fiebant domunculæ de pellibus caprarum supertectæ, in quibus missæ celebrantur, et inde capellæ nomen tractum est.'" The ignorance of Durandus has given an inaccuracy to his language, thus made the "domunculæ" more than one within one pavilion, "in tentorio," and then derived "capella" ridiculously from "pellibus caprarum." But we see the object distinctly enough through the mist; and I have accordingly translated his "inde capellæ nomen tractum est," merely into what must be certainly included in the meaning, "to this was the name of chapel given," but not into all which is included, that "hence the very name of chapel was derived."

¶ Asser, 68: "Suos capellanos imperavit,—coram sanctis multorum electorum Dei reliquiis, quæ semper eum ubique comitabantur,—ventorum violentiâ inflante—per—tentoriorum tenuitates," &c.

* Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 208: "Posuit in capellâ suâ candelam viginti quatuor partium."

"in

“in the monastery of St. Eimeram he saw the altar, which Charles the Great carried about with him, and used in his tent, upon his warlike expeditions †.” A prelate of Ely also was buried, in 1478, “with torches, and horses, and one horse bearing his chapel with its ornaments and furniture,” a small tent with its “furniture” of relics and an altar, as well as with candles, plate, and book for the “ornaments” of the latter ‡. A bishop of Durham also was buried in 1333, when for a burial-fee was claimed “the chapel, namely, the horses carrying the shrine, the wax-candles, and the rest §.” A second bishop of Durham was interred in 1359, when with greater explicitness the author mentions “two great horses bearing his body in a litter, and one mule bearing his chapel || :” as in 1381, “the body” of a third “was brought in a chariot,” while “the chapel” still attended the procession ¶. And, to run back into a very early period of Saxon antiquity, Ina, king of the West-Saxons, in the seventh century, “caused a chapel to be formed of silver and gold, with ornaments and vases equally gold and silver; and placed it within the great church” of Glastonbury; “delivering two thousand six hundred and forty pounds of silver for forming the chapel, as the altar was two hundred and sixty-four pounds of gold, the chalice and patin of ten pounds of gold, the censer eight pounds and twenty mancuses of gold, the candlesticks twelve pounds and a half of silver, the coverings of the books of the Gospel twenty pounds and sixty mancuses of gold, the water-vessels and

† Staveley's Hist. of Churches, 215, from “Vit. Amberbach. ad fin. Constitut. Car. Magni.”

‡ Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 673: “Cum torchis, et equis, et uno equo portante capellam suam cum ornamentis et apparatu.”

§ Ibid. i. 761: “Vendicabat sibi sacrista capellam, scilicet, equos feretrum deferentes, ceram, et alia.”

|| Ibid. i. 766: “Duos magnos equos portantes corpus ejus in lecticâ, et unum equum mulum portantem capellam.”

¶ Ibid. i. 771, 772: “Veredam, Anglicè chariot, in quâ dicti episcopi corpus fuerat deportatum,—inno et capellam.” In explanation of carrying a corpse in a chariot, which may sound strange to the nice ear of criticism, let me remark, that the corpse was carried merely on the wheels of the carriage, the body being taken off; and that funerals of a superior sort, if coming from a distance, are thus conducted in Cornwall to this day.

“ other vases of the altar seventeen pounds of gold;” water being even now used by the Papists and some Protestants of our own church, as it was equally used by the primitive church, to make the wine of the eucharist more truly wine—by the infusion of water, “ basins” for the offertory “ seven pounds of gold, vase for the holy water twenty pounds “ of silver, an image of our Lord and of the blessed Mary and of the “ twelve apostles a hundred and seventy-five pounds of silver and thirty- “ eight pounds of gold,” the apostles being in silver, but our Lord and the Virgin Mary in gold, “ the pall for the altar and the ornaments for the “ priests being artfully woven on both sides with gold and precious “ stones*.” This is such a chapel of relics as antiquity cannot parallel, for expensiveness of fabrication and costliness of decorations, worthy of the monarch that had it formed, and worthy of the church to which he gave it. Thus did the Latin appellation for a case of relics gradually extend itself to what it always accompanied, the moveable “ sacellum” of a king or a bishop in their travels, the portable and private “ ark “ of God dwelling within curtains†.” Thus too it came to fix finally upon those “ eccelesiæ” of stone, which were erected for oratories and tomb-houses at greater churches, or were attached as oratories merely to palaces, to priories, and to mansion-houses; because these were, equally with those, the repositories of relics.

How soon these chapels began to be built, who can pretend to ascertain? Facts alone must do this, and let facts therefore do it. Bishop

* Gale, i. 310, 311: “ Fecit etiam idem rex construere quandam capellam ex auro et “ argento, cum ornamentis et vasis similiter aureis et argenteis; ac infra” for intra “ ma- “ jorem [ecclesiam] collocavit. Ad capellam itaque construendam duo millia et sexcenta et “ quadraginta libras argenti donavit, et altare ex ducentis et sexaginta quatuor libris auri erat, “ calix cum patenâ de x libris auri, incensarium de viii libris et xx mancis auri, candelabra “ ex xii libris et dimidio argenti, coopertoria librorum Evangelii de xx libris et lx mancis “ auri, vasa aquaria et alia vasa altaris ex xvii libris auri, pelves de viii libris auri, vas ad “ aquam benedictam ex xx libris argenti, imago Domini et Beatæ Mariæ et duodecim apos- “ tolorum ex centum et lxxv libris argenti et xxxviii libris auri, palla altaris et ornamenta “ sacerdotalia undique auro et lapidibus pretiosis subtiliter contexta.”

† “ See now,” cries the dignified because devout David, “ I dwell in an house of cedar, “ but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains.” 1 Sam. vii. 2.

Symon, of Ely, died in 1344, and was buried at Ely in the new chapel of St. Mary, before “the altar of the same chapel, on the fabric of which he had laid out very great sums ‡;” as Crandene, a prior of Ely, who died in 1341, “caused to be erected at the prior’s lodging a new chapel of wonderful beauty §.” That new chapel we find mentioned as the old, a few years before; when one, who became bishop of Ely in 1290, and sat seven years, was buried “on the south side of the church, between the two pillars near the high altar, at the entrance of the old chapel of St. Mary ||.” We here see a chapel by name attached to the cathedral, attached even to the prior’s lodging, so early at Ely! But much earlier, even in or about 1133, St. Etheldred, the founder and patroness of the church at Ely, was said to have been “seen praying in a certain chapel” of her own church, “holding the psalter in one hand and a wax-candle lighted in the other ¶.” Only a few years later we find two chapels more in the church of Ely, called Chetesham and Dounham, and one in the very infirmary of the priory *. About 1130, Malmesbury mentions “the chapel of St. Andrew,” “the chapel of the Holy Trinity,” and “the chapel of St. Martin,” each of which is denominated an “ecclesiola” by another author in the Monasticon; and as having given the names of Andrewesie, of Godney, and of Martenesie, to the isles on which they respectively lay, within the jurisdiction of Glastonbury †. Bishops, we may be sure, had chapels

‡ Gale, i. 652: “Sepultus est apud Ely in novâ capellâ S. Mariæ, coram altare ejusdem capellæ, circa ejus fabricam sumptuosas fecit expensas.”

§ Ibid. i. 649: “Fabricari fecit ad hospitium prioris novam capellam mirandi decoris.”

|| Ibid. i. 639: “Ex parte australi ecclesiæ, inter duas columnas juxta magnum altare, ad introitum veteris capellæ B. Mariæ.”

¶ Ibid. i. 618: “B. Etheldreda visa fuit orare in quâdam capellâ, in unâ manu psalterium tenuit, in aliâ vero cereum accensum.”

* Ibid. i. 633: “In ecclesiâ Elyensi—calices—, quorum unus fuit in capellâ infirmorum,—unus in capellâ de Chetesham, et alius in capellâ de Dounham.”

† Ibid. i. 330: “Andrewesie—sic cognominatur a Sancto Andrea, ejus ibidem habetur capella, sicut et Godenix propter capellam Sanctæ Trinitatis, et Martenesie a Sancto Martino, ejus ibidem est capella.” Monasticon, i. 2: “Ecclesiola de Sanctâ Trinitate,” “ecclesiolam Sancti Andreæ,” “ecclesiolam Sancti Martini.” Hence Godney appears to be more truly denominated Godney, and the vulgar prove better etymologists than the learned.

at their palaces, as we have seen a prior have one at his lodging. Accordingly Walkelin, who died bishop of Winchester in 1098, is noticed "as often as he celebrated the solemn service of the mass in his chapel at Winchester, to have had a deacon and subdeacon from the "monastery †." Kings also had their chapels, as Edgar is attested to have "given out of his chapel cases and philateries" of relics, "with "the relics of some saints §." We have even seen chapels to large churches before, under the appellation of porticoes: as early as the days of Bede, as early as the days of Eddius ||. And in a charter given by Ina, but recited by Malmesbury, we find even the rural chapels in the jurisdiction of Glastonbury, mentioned as early as 725; the charter forbidding the bishop to fix his episcopal chair, or to do any official act, without invitation from the abbot, "in the very church of "Glastonbury, or in the churches subject to it,—or in their chapels ¶." Chapels, therefore, are very old among us, were very early denominated "ecclesiolæ," or little churches, by our ancestors, and in their origin are nearly as old as our churches themselves.

Such an ecclesiola we know to have been formed in St. German's priory; as tradition says it contained that very series of paintings, which ranges along the side of the new room called the gallery. These are paintings finely executed, though not artfully designed; not sufficiently attentive to the principles of perspective, but very pleasing to the eye of a surveyor, from the lively brilliancy of their colours, very affecting to the mind of a religious man, from the sacred nature of their subject, and very striking to the imagination of an antiquary, from their age. The series comprehends the venerable history of our Saviour's life,

† Wharton, i. 296: "Quoties celebrabat missarum solemnia in capellâ suâ Wintoniensi, diaconum et subdiaconum monachos habebat."

§ Ibid. i. 604: "Dedit—de suâ capellâ capsides et philateria, cum nonnullorum sanctorum reliquiis."

|| See ii. 3, preceding.

¶ Gale, i. 312: "Ne in ipsam Glästoniæ ecclesiam, nec in ecclesiis sibi subditis,—nec "in earum capellis." See also Edgar's charter in Monasticon, i. 16, as fuller still, yet less true.

from his nativity to his crucifixion, in fourteen tablets, twelve on boards and two on canvass. The late lord's aunt was actually offered five hundred pounds for them; and, as an ancient monument of the art of painting, they are (I suppose) much more valuable. They are, however, beginning now to chip with age; and may well do so, though they were preserved with all attention by my lord, being hung upon a southern wall, on each side of a large fire-place, well supplied with fuel. Their age we know to be prior to the Reformation, and they are certainly more than two hundred and fifty years old. But what is their certain age to their probable? Upon every principle of historical probability, we must refer them to a much earlier date, to the days of bishop Bartholomew, the founder of the chapel, and consequently the decorator of it. Thus they are more than six hundred years old; the oldest set of paintings, I presume, in the whole kingdom. Yet that antiquity which gives such a dignity to them, requires they should be preserved by being copied; and the present lord will have them copied, I hope, before the very vividness of the colouring has proved perfidious to the duration of it, or age has robbed the paintings of more of their original lustre. But the chapel, which they so richly decorated, is pointed out by the finger of tradition to have been in the body-end of the eastern wing, between what are reported to have been the lodgings of the prior, and what I suppose to have been the dormitory of the monks, upon what is now shrunk up into a narrow passage, betwixt the best drawing-room and the best eating-parlour, yet terminates in a window with an open pavilion to the east *.

These

* Mr. Willis, in a gross barbarism of taste, has omitted all mention of these paintings, and in a gross unfeelingness of antiquarianism, all designation of the rooms occupied by the chapel, the dormitory, the parlour, or the portal of this priory. I had originally recommended the care of the paintings above to the late lord, and to his oldest son; many months before the premature and sudden decease of him who was characterized by me as "the singularly worthy heir" of the late lord, the honourable Edward James Elliot, in September 1797. But though I could not leave this to remain in the text, I cannot but recite it in a note, as the strongest signature of my respect for the memory of a person, whom every good husband and every good man must long continue to respect; who, by the indulgence of habitual sorrow for the loss of a beloved wife, had contracted such a tendency to spasms

These were the parts of the priory, which bishop Bartholomew must have constructed, when he introduced canons regular into it in the room of the secular before; when he therefore compelled them to eat together in one dining-room, to sleep together in one dormitory, and to pray together every third hour of the night in one chapel. Such constructions undoubtedly form a very considerable portion of the priory. The bishop was accordingly considered, on account of them, and of his establishment of monkery in them, to stand in the very relation of Athelstan to the priory, to supersede indeed the honour of Athelstan in founding it, and to rank as the very founder himself. "There was here," says Leland from the records of the priory, "an episcopal see in the time of Ethelstan, which was afterwards transferred to the church of Exeter by St. Edward the Confessor-king; and afterwards Bartholomew, then bishop of Exeter, here founded a monastery of regular canons*." His arms therefore were sure to be painted, if any were, in the bow-window of the dining-room. Nor let me rest my general reference of these arms to the personal constructor, upon any notions however common in themselves, upon any principles however apparent of good sense. Let me appeal to authority, because in antiquarianism, as in law, authority is considered to be of more weight than reason, even the authority of the first of our English antiquaries, Leland; who says bishop "Skirlaw made all or a peace of the lanterns at York minster,—for there be his armes sette †." Skirlaw's own historian says accordingly: "he built a great part of—what is vulgarly called the lantern, at in the heart; according to the accounts of his physicians, as made him at last a martyr to that best of all earthly loves, the conjugal; but who, still more to the honour of his head and of his heart, confessed privately to a friend many years before his death, even in the first paroxysms of his sorrow, that he could find no relief from it except in the Book of GOD: "Vivat post funera virtus!" May such virtue still live in the remembrance of the religious, as live it certainly does and will in the unperishing records of GOD!

* Leland's Coll. i. 75: "Fuit tempore Ethelstani sedes episcopalis, quæ postea per S. Edwardum Confess. regem translata fuit ad ecclesiam Exoniensem. Et post B. tunc episcopus Exon. hic fundavit monaster. canon. regularium."

† Itin. viii. 9.

"York:

“York minster; in the middle of which work, he placed his arms ‡.” In the “bow-window” also “yet remain, in—painted glass,” says Mr. Willis, concerning his own time, “the arms of Arundel, viz. six martlets or, quartering Carminow, azure, a bend or.” These belong to John Arundel, the very builder of the ancient parsonage at St. Columb, who was made bishop of Exeter in 1502, and died in 1504 §. He was, as I have noticed before ||, of the Arundels of Lanhern in Cornwall, and his great-grandfather John had married Elizabeth, daughter and coheiress of sir Oliver Carminow, knight. His own private arms only are exhibited, just as I have noticed those of bishop Bartholomew to be before; just also as those of bishop Skirlaw are upon the lantern at York, six rods interlacing one another in the shape of a sieve*; and just as those of archbishop Sudbury, sable a talbot sejant within a border engrailed argent, with those of another benefactor not known by them now, a text AA crowned or, on a cross azure, are still seen in a window of the chapter-house at Canterbury ¶; for one and the same reason, their construction of these respective buildings out of their private fortunes. The bishops of Exeter indeed might naturally consider themselves as officially the patrons of St. German’s priory, from the refounding of it by one of their predecessors in the see. Yet this alone could not have produced a selection of bishops, to be recorded upon glass. It could still less have produced so scanty a selection. It could, least of all, have marked the persons of this selection by their private arms. The distinguishing though frail memorial for bishop Arundel, therefore, was occasioned by the same principle as bishop Bartholomew’s own was; and the honour was paid

‡ Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 775: “Hic—magnam partem vulgò lanterii, ministerii Eboracensis construxit; in medio ejus operis, arma sua posuit.”

§. Willis, 149, 150; and Godwin, 415. He had the custody of the temporalities, 22 Feb. 1501, that is, 1501-2, and the investiture of them, 5 July 1502. He died 15 March 1503, that is, 1503-4.

|| See vi. 1.

* Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i. 775. Skirlaw built, besides the lantern at York, a great part of the cloyster at Durham, &c. “De quibus omnibus ædificiis arma sua, viz. 6 virgas vicissim flexatas in formâ cribri, imposuit.” This kind of bearing, in the mystical language of heraldry, is called fretty.

¶ Gostling, 399.

to beneficence, by gratitude. Arundel was a benefactor to the priory, in rebuilding probably some part of the original structure, that had now grown ruinous; and so was commemorated in this ever-open, ever-legible book of benefactors. But, as he died in two years after his coming to the see, he assuredly did not live to perfect what he had begun; and his immediate successor, Hugh Oldham, who died in 1519, completing the work for him, became entitled to a pane with him in this perishing register of honour. Hence we have in the bow-window "likewise," adds Mr. Willis, "the arms of this priory, as I "suppose, being a sword and two keys endorsed in saltire ", impaling Ouldham, bishop of Exeter (as I judge by the "mitre over it), sable, a cheveron or, between three owls proper, on a "chief of the second three roses gules *." Mr. Willis mistakes the impaling arms for those of the priory, when the mitre shews them to be those of the bishopric. They are indeed a little different from the present arms of the see; the sword of these being in pale or placed erect, and of those in saltire or placed oblique. But the priory-arms have been accidentally discovered, since Mr. Willis wrote; where the difference between them and his appears much greater. In digging among the ruins of the chancel a few years ago, along with the seat for a stall was found a rounded piece of oak, black in colour, but about fourteen inches and a half in length, with two feet in circumference; charged with a sword and one key in saltire. This was one of the two pillars at the sides of the stall, being fluted in front, yet flat at the back, having all its original length, and therefore shewing the sword with the key about the middle of it. It hence appears, as the very existence of arms on such an object witnesses, a pillar to the stall of the prior; the only member of a monastery also, as I have shewn before, who sat in the chancel †. Thus we have three stalls of stone in the cathedral of Rochester, one of which is marked by the arms of the see to be the bishop's ‡. The arms then of "a sword and two keys endorsed in saltire," impaling what are certainly the arms of Oldham, as they are equally displayed in stucco over the chimney-piece of a room, that was

* Willis, 150.

† See iii. 3, before.

‡ Arch. x. 267.

formerly

formerly the principal part of the president's lodgings in a very respectable college at Oxford, to which Oldham was equally a benefactor, even CORPUS CHRISTI, that and are again displayed upon the tomb of the bishop, in the cathedral of Exeter; unite with the mitre to shew Oldham was bishop of Exeter, and to tell he was a benefactor to the priory. The arms of Sudbury, the archbishop, appear on the eastern side, and the arms of the archbishopric on the western, of a door in the chapter-house leading into the cloysters at Canterbury*. And as to the sword with two keys endorsed in saltire, however unnoticed the incident has hitherto been by the crowd of our heraldical or local writers, they were certainly the arms of the see down to the death of Oldham †.

Pyrgo, tot Priami natorum regia nutrix;

We thus lend an historical consequence to these arms in the bow-window of the dining-room; yet give them only as much as the arms on the stucco or in the windows of our colleges at Oxford, and the arms on the windows, the doors, or the stalls, at Canterbury, or at York, are known to have. We even find there were arms on the same principle, within the church of St. German's; the benefactors to it being recorded at it, in the same manner. "There yet remain," adds Mr. Willis, concerning the church of his time, but without the slightest application of the fact to history, so much quicker is the eye than the intellect in most persons! "some arms in the windows, with carvings on the seats, "particularly of Stafford and Courtney, bishops of Exeter; and the "aforesaid arms, viz. a sword and two keys endorsed in saltire, presumed to be those of the priory, are frequently repeated ‡." Peter Courtney was made bishop of Exeter in 1478, and Edmund Stafford in 1395 before §. These must both of them have been considerable benefactors to the church, and therefore had their memories preserved within it in this emblematical manner. They probably were the repairers of the church, in two important points. The roof of the nave, as I

* Gostling, 399, 400.

† Willis, 152.

‡ Tanner's Notitia by Nasmyth, p. xxix.

§ Godwin, 414 and 412.

have formerly observed, was all carved originally, and still remains so from the western end to the fourth pillar eastward. This shews the roof to have been repaired, and with less than royal munificence, at some late period. But there has been a renewal in an adjoining part of the church, still more remarkable. The three next arches to the east, but on the south, are more ornamented than the four to the west, the curves of them are less sharp, the pillars are of a slenderer bulk, and the stone of Tarton Down is suddenly exchanged for moorstone. Tradition also tells to the present day, of some grand reparation made of these arches of the church, it knows not when, but in consequence of some destruction, it knows not what. These renovations of the church, therefore, appear to correspond with the suggestions of the arms, and to shew Stafford, to shew Courtney, thus recorded on account of these renovations. But the same arms appeared with carvings upon some seats, if we consider the words of Mr. Willis in a sense strictly grammatical; or, in that laxer sort of interpretation, which alone (I believe) is suited to his loose mode of writing, carvings appeared without any arms; to mark some one seat with distinction, and to make it considered by Mr. Willis as erected by one of these bishops. One accordingly remains, and only one, when the arms of the windows have vanished with their glass; a tall, large, antique pew in the parochial, and not the priory, part of the church, the chancel of the old cathedral, worked all over with carvings, once the seat of the rector assuredly, then that of the steward of the rectory, and therefore that of the lessee of the rectory at present. But the arms of the see we find “a sword and two “keys indorsed in saltire,” were “frequently repeated” in the windows. These windows, like that seat, must have been in the parochial part of the church; as (except a skylight recently opened) there are no windows in the priory part, either large or lightsome enough to receive any painting of arms upon them. The very windows therefore concur with the evidence before, to prove the arms were emblazoned upon them, as the ensigns of the bishopric, and not of the priory. And the latter arms combine with the former, to shew those of Courtney and of Stafford were, what we have seen episcopal arms twice before to be, merely the private and family arms of those bishops; yet to indicate their episcopal dignity, dignity, by their episcopal arms repeated on the windows. So, at Canterbury, “in the great western window of the chapter-house, are “four shields supported by angels, which are evidently intended to “commemorate the builders of the nave, cloisters, and chapter-house;” one, Sudbury’s, another unknown, “the third, Courtney, the fourth, “Arundel—. The same arms,” Sudbury’s, “and those of Courtney “and Arundel are often repeated in the vaulting of the nave, the “chapter-house, and cloister*.”

Coats of arms were originally the cognizance of military men alone. But war becoming what it is dreadful to think, the general profession of man, the chief object of his passions, and the principal ground of his glory; these cognizances grew so extensive in their use, and so honourable in their nature, that all the professions of peace itself, the lawyers, the physicians, even the very clergy, took up the symbols of war, either as private persons or as public functionaries, to mark their pride of family, or to shew their dignity of office. Hence priors and bishops had their coats of arms, equally with warriors themselves. Such a practice would be sure to arise soon, upon the general use of such badges; and, as the badges have already appeared to be very ancient, the practice must be ancient too. Those I have proved to have been long prior to the Conquest, and this seems to be also prior; the arms upon the oaken pillar being probably as old as the stall, as the very chancel itself, and consequently coæval with Athelstan, the constructor of both. Hence Bartholomew, the bishop of Exeter, so early as 1161, could have his arms put up in the bow-window of that dining-room, which he erected for his regular canons; as a signature of his erection of it. Hence also we find the prior of Bodmin retaining to the Reformation those arms of his office, which must originally have been assumed by his predecessors, when the church had equally a prior and a bishop; prior Vivian, who died in 1533, appearing to this day in the church with these “the arms of the prior,” upon his tomb, “in a field St. Pedyr “[St. Petrock] sitting in his chair or throne of state proper, with his

* Gostling, 399, 400.

“ crozier in his hand and mitre on his head ;” arms, evidently those of the bishopric at first, as evidently those of the priory afterwards, and still remaining as both, with a little variation, the arms of the town at present *. The prior of St. German’s, in the same mode of acting as his younger brother of Bodmin, adopted the arms of the bishopric for the arms of the priory, and continued the use of them probably after the seat of the bishopric was removed to Exeter. The removed bishop also, like the town of Bodmin, retained the arms of both with a little variation; doubling the keys to signify the double sees, indorsing them to make them more distinguishable, but still keeping the sword in saltire with them; and having erected the sword since, to discriminate the whole perhaps from the nearly similar arms of Winchester see.

Malmesbury intimates concerning the regular canons of Exeter, as I have noted before, that their strict discipline, “ in the luxuriousness of “ the times, has been in some degree relaxed ;” by permission probably to the canons, under pretence of sickness, to sleep and to eat occasionally in other apartments. There must therefore have been an INFIRMARY for them, in the priories of Exeter and St. German’s; at which they were discharged from the nightly offices of devotion in the chapel, and even indulged with better dishes of meat. To gain such an indulgence, and such a discharge, under such a severity of discipline; pretences would naturally be made of sickness, often. But, with such a severity, nature would frequently furnish a just plea, and sickness visit their macerated bodies in reality. What their prescribed rate of living was, we know too well in general. Yet it may be requisite just to mention one or two circumstances in it, to fix the whole more livelily on our minds, and to repress for ever that wanton impotence of prejudice, which at one time is looking down with pity on the pious absurdity of monks, in denying themselves the common comforts of life, yet at another is flourishing in gay sarcasms upon the luxuriousness of their lives, the “ pontificum “ cœnæ” of a monastery †.

Bread,

* Hals, 20 and 19.

† The common topic of invective against monkish luxury, among the more literary inveighers, is one lent by Giraldus Cambrensis, that professed foe to the monks: “ De

“ ferculis

Bread, that great corrector of all the humours of the body occasioned by animal food, that principal supporter of human life, in any form of feeding, “ferculis, et eorum numerositate, quid dicam,” he cries concerning the monks of Canterbury, “nisi quod ipsum [Giraldum] multoties dicentem audiui; quia sedecim aut plura per ordinem—sunt apposita, valde sumptuosa.” Even if this account be just as a censure, it applies only to the members of one monastery. Yet what were these dishes? Only of fish, dressed in various manners. “Tot enim videas,” he adds, “piscium genera, assa quidem et elixa, farta et frixa, tot ovis et pipere cibaria cocorum arte confecta, tot saporis et salsamenta ad gulam irritandam et appetitum excitandum eorundem arte composita;” to subdue the natural insipidity of fish, and by variations of cookery to multiply one dish into many. So far the intended censure is refuted by the facts themselves. Nor is the eating luxurious, even in this richly endowed monastery. But perhaps the drinking is; for, as Gervase goes on, “ad hæc etiam in tantâ abundantia vinum hic videas et siceram, pigmentum,” a mixture of wine, honey, and spices, “et claretum,” is not this the earliest mention of claret in all history? “mustum et medonem atque moretum,” what liquor? mulberry wine? “atque omne quod inebriare potest; adeo ut cerevisia, qualis in Angliâ fieri solet optima, et præcipuè in Cantia, locum inter cetera non haberet.” This seems a formidable arrangement of liquors upon the table of a monk. But it is not so formidable as it seems. Even Giraldus pretends not to notice any abuse made of these liquors by the monks. And the day was a high festival, even Trinity Sunday, the very name-day of the church itself; in which abstemiousness might innocently indulge, and even self-denial should in reason relax into some luxury. Such indeed are the rules, by which the most self-denying and most abstemious always act in the world, of which reason suggests the theory, and in which innocence approves the execution! On such a day, therefore, and with such a practice, the liquors appear not too luxurious, and the dishes even seem to want variety. Yet the mode of a monk’s living is to be estimated, not from what it may have been occasionally upon a festival, but from what it was regularly and ordinarily through the year. Take then “a short bill of fare” for this very monastery, “such as was allowed” by the standing orders of the house: “to every two monks, when they had soles, there were four soles in a dish; when they had plaice, two plaice; when they had herrings, eight herrings; when they had whittings, eight whittings; when they had mackrels, two mackrels; and when they had eggs, ten eggs; if they any thing more allowed them beyond” this “their ordinary fare,” it was either cheese, or fruit, or the like.” (Battely, 96.) Go now, thou sneerer at the luxury of monks, and sit down with them to thy banquet of five eggs or of one mackrel for dinner.

I nunc, et tecum musas meditare canoras.

“Quid autem,” as Giraldus goes on in a strain of impertinent interrogation, “ad hæc Paulus Eremita diceret?” &c. &c. &c. Such arguments would preclude all possibility of a feast; they, therefore, can never prove the luxuriousness of any. Sensible of this, I suppose, the author comes to an anecdote, that fashionable supplement for a reason at present feeding, was dispensed to the monks in angular pieces, denominated cantles. These however were halves of loaves; as the lepers of Mary Magdalen, in Reading, had every day from the abbey there, “a cantle, “containing half a loaf of bread*,” half of such small round loaves as are still common in our colleges at Oxford. From this application of the word. Shakespeare makes Percy to say of the Trent;

See how this river comes me, cranking in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land,
A huge half-moon, a monstrous cantle out.

Even lately the parishioners of Childrey, near Wantage, in Berkshire, having been long in the habit of eating and drinking upon one day in the year, within the house of the rector; this feast of bread and cheese, as I believe it to have been, was popularly entitled Childrey cantle†.

sent. “Monachi S. Swithuni Wintoniæ,” he tells us, “cum priore suo coram Anglorum rege Henrico II. ad terram in luto prostrati, cum lacrimis et luctu conquesti sunt ei, quod eorum episcopus Ricardus, quem et loco abbatis habebant, tria eis fercula subtraxerat.” The tale, we see, is recited in an invidious style of aggravation. It thus loses much of its weight. Nor is it possible to be true as related. The bishop was not the abbot, and so could not cut off any dishes as abbot. About two centuries before, an abbot had been appointed by the bishop himself, even by the very bishop who changed the clergymen of the church into monks; “Ethelwoldus, canonicis expulsis, monachos posuit, præficiens eis abbatem Edgarum nomine.” (Malmesbury, f. 140.) Yet the author proceeds with his story thus: “et cum rege inquirente quot eis remanserant, responderent decem, quoniam ab antiquo tredecim habere consueverant; et ego, inquit rex, in curiâ meâ tribus ferculis contentus sum;” a position so apparently false in itself, as unites with the utter incredibility of the complaint, and the certain falsehood of the inference, to fix a brand of reprobation on the whole for ever. With such ingenuity of malice, such sophistry of reasoning, and such forgery of facts, have the monks been condemned for luxuriousness of living by Giraldus! And with such inattention to the forgery, to the sophistry, or to the malice, has the passage been cited, referred to, or hinted at, by the enemies of monks for a century past! See the passage in Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, ii. 480. But we shall now hear of it no more, I believe.

* Monasticon, i. 419: “Singuli cantelli dimidium panis habentes.”

† So in a pamphlet of 1636, we read “not so much as a cantle of cheese or crust of bread.” (Shakespeare, viii. 493, note.) This custom had been so long observed as a kindness from the rector, that it was at last demanded as a right by the parishioners. These even proceeded to such lengths of violence, as to burst open and beat down the door of the parsonage, when barred against them, on the accustomed day. The rector of course appealed to the law, and the law abolished the intrusion by commuting the charity. A punster therefore exclaimed that the rector had made the parishioners “recinere cantilenam.”

Childewic,

Childewic, which was given to St. Alban's abbey by Aildwin and his wife Ailfleda, under the license and at the persuasion of king Ethelred, says M. Paris, "as both the king and the givers interpreted the name, " derived it from the children, because the land was bestowed to provide food for those younger monks, who were to be kept upon a milk diet.†." With this they were allowed the use of flesh-meat at times. So far the discipline of a monastic table was like some of our own, sober, just, and mild. But the affectation of rigour prevailing as powerfully then, as the ambition of indulgence predominates now; this mildness was soon changed into harshness. Paul the abbot, as Mr. Newcome tells us, between the years 1077-1093, "made many regulations in the " diet of the monks, restraining them from immoderate use of flesh-
" meat, and causing them to live on pickled herrings;" then (as a note subjoins) "called by the Normans haren-pie §." But the harshness was not at all what Mr. Newcome makes it to be; being confined to the younger monks entirely, and therefore more harsh; but not restraining them merely to "pickled herrings," and therefore less unkind; nor yet forbidding them "the immoderate use of flesh-meat," acting even with higher rigour, and forbidding all use of it. "To the young " monks," as Paris really tells us, "who, according to their custom, " lived upon pasties of flesh-meat," a food very common with the richer labourers in Cornwall to this day, "he prevented all inordinate eating" by stinting the quantity; "and he heaped up a dish for them all in " common, of which the mere appellation remains at present, made of " herrings and sheets of cakes," or, in other words, of herrings under covers of pastry, which was therefore "called by the Normans," that is, by Paul himself, the institutor, the first Norman abbot of St. Alban's, "haren-pie," or, as Paris himself says more precisely, "which he, in " the sophistical pronunciation of the Normans, denominated car-pie for

† M. Paris, 1002: "Sicut tam rex quam datores interpretati sunt, a pueris trahit locus " vocabulum, quia ad alimenta monachorum juniorum lacticiniis alendorum conferebatur, " unde et Childewica nuncupatur." He also mentions "aliud vacasterium, quod antiquitus " Childel-angeleia vocabatur."

§ P. 49.

"karen-pie *." When such rigour was exercised upon the palate of the young, more (we may be sure) was exerted upon that of the manly and middle ages of life. These accordingly lived almost entirely upon fish. We indeed, in our use of fish at times only, or with rich sauces, or as introductory to flesh-meat, are apt to smile at statutes or canons enjoining us to fast upon fish. But to eat fish alone, to eat it almost continually, to eat it too as robbed of all its nutritious juices by age, as only preserved from putrefaction by being embalmed in salt; we should think the most painful of fasts. Yet, as Paris tells us, abbot William of St. Alban's, in the reign of John, "bought a house at Yarmouth, "for storing fish, and particularly herring, when bought up at "the proper season; to the invaluable advantage and honour of St. "Alban's house: and made to it also an expensive addition †." Thus was the young monk trained up to the almost constant use of herrings as a man, by being kept upon herring-pies as a child. Pies indeed of all sorts seem to have been formerly more frequent upon our tables than they are at present. Pies of fish, particularly, appear to have been very fashionable formerly; as the twenty-four pies or pasties of the first fresh herrings, sent by Norwich every year to the king, according to charter, very significantly shew us. These are now eaten, I believe, by the very menials in the royal kitchen. Even in Cornwall, where the use of pies is so generally preserved, that the English have marked the natives in derision, as men who would put the devil in a pie, if they could catch him; where even fish-pies are sometimes eaten in the parlour, and often in the kitchen; I, who have naturalized my appetite, as a foreigner, to almost all the peculiar dishes of the country, have never been able to relish a pie of fresh fish, and never attempted to taste what is not uncommon among the labourers or servants, a pie of salted pilchards. Yet salted herrings, in pies or out of them, we see, were the standing dishes of the monk; mocking his appetite with a fare unsubstantial, unpleasing, unnourishing; and fixing our national disease, the scurvy, in full tyranny over his frame. Thus was all flesh banished from his table, and interdicted to his palate, from the years of childhood to the very verge of life! No rest, no respite was allowed to health or strength, except at Christmas, Easter, or the festival of the abbey's saint, when fowls, eggs, and pork were allowed ‡; or in occasional visits to the infirmary.

* Paris, 1003: "Minutis—, qui de suâ consuetudine pastillis carnis vescabantur, esus "subtraxit inordinatos, et, pro carne, de allece et liborum cedulis," cedulis for schedulis, as schedule is occasionally pronounced cedule at present, "congestum, quoddam ferculum " (cujus solum remansit nomen) ipsis in communi cumulavit; quod more Normanorum "karpie, quasi karenpie, sophisticè nominavit." Mr. Newcome did not understand the "liborum cedulis," and therefore omitted it entirely, though so requisite to the explanation of his own "haren-pie."

† Paris, 1057: "Comparavit—unam domum apud Gernemutham, ad piscem et præ- "cipuè alce, in tempore opportuno comparatum, reponendum; ad inæstimabilem domus "S. Albani utilitatem et honorem: cui etiam sumptuosam addidit emendationem."

Where then, in the priory of St. German's, was the infirmary of it? It was, I suppose, at the western end of the building, in what appears to have been an addition to the rest, as it did not line behind with the back-front of the building, but receded considerably from it, and then pushed forward to form a western wing to the whole. In this was a narrow passage, along the northern side of what is now the gallery; which ran along the side beyond the present fire-place, and, by a low door, still remaining there, communicated with a structure as long as the gallery, now forming my lord's bed-room to the east, my lady's dressing-room to the west, and a small room of communication between them. The passage and the door unite to shew, that the structure was formerly entered as it now is, in the middle room; having, as it now has, a room to the right and left of this. There then the invalids, real or pretended, of the priory, I suggest, had one apartment for their bed-room, another for their dining-room, and each upon each side of their room of entrance, that bed-room probably of an official attendant*.

Other

‡ Paris, 1007.

* As many particulars have occurred above in reference to herrings, which are directly opposite to some authorities truly respectable in themselves; let me confirm in a note what I have advanced in my text, and add other evidences from history to those above. "Haleces," says Camden, 584, "—tempore quæ proavornum seculo [a word here superfluous]," in a passage too literally rendered by bishop Gibson, "in the time of our grand-

Other parts of the house were laid out in rooms for the deacons, as one deacon we shall soon find here, sub-deacons, or others, and in a kitchen,

"fathers" (c. 905), but "in the time of our forefathers," more justly, by Mr. Gough (iii. 17), "tantum ad Norwegiam sua quasi stativa habuerunt;" inelegantly translated by the bishop "swarmed only about Norway," as inelegantly, and very falsely, by Mr. Gough, "seemed to confine themselves to the coasts of Norway," where the "quasi," which refers merely to the "stativa," and is only meant to qualify a little the poetical tone of the expression, is applied to "habuerunt," and the author made to speak that dubiously which he avers positively, "[seculo, a word here wanted] nostro Britanniam nostram, non sine divino consilio, numerosis examinibus quotannis circumnatant." Camden thus asserts the herrings to have formerly migrated no lower to the south than Norway, but in his time to have come as low as the British Channel. What scope of past time he comprehends in his "tempore proavorum," is not immediately apparent; but, from the opposition made between that time and his own, he must point at the period directly antecedent to his. This, therefore, as contradicting my text, I am studious to refute. It was not in his editions of 1590 or 1594, and ought not to have been in any. Leland, who wrote within this very period, lends us two notices in direct refutation of it; saying, in Itin. v. 55, 56, that "about the shore of Wyrall on Mersey side to Walsley village, on the very shore,—men use much to salte herring taken at the se by the mouth of Mersey;" and saying also concerning Lanunda parish, near St. David's in South Wales, "here about is hering fishing," ibid. 29. "The method of packing and salting of herrings was not known," Mr. Smith also tells us, in his History of Cork, ii. 309, "till 1416," and therefore was known as early as 1416; "Mr. Willoughby observes, that William Buckelz, a native of Bier Uliet, has rendered his name immortal, by the discovery of the secret of curing and packing herrings; he adds, that the emperor Charles V. coming into the Low Countries, with his sister the queen of Hungary, they made a journey to Bier Uliet, on purpose to view the tomb of this barreller of herrings." So early were herrings even salted for their preservation, on the coasts fronting our own! But they were actually salted long before, upon our own. "A record, 1 Edw. III. 1368," Mr. Gough remarks, p. 79, from the same Mr. Smith, in his subsequent History of Down, p. 243, "mentions a duty on them in Ireland; which proves they had a method of pickling and preserving them, fifty years sooner than is generally thought." So much at random is immortality of fame dispensed, by the mistaken voice of man! In the same reign of Edward III. but in a much earlier year of it, 1332, the king granted a charter to the town of Great Yarmouth, which notices its present fishery of herrings, in mentioning its vessels laden either with hering or with other fish, "seu de allece seu de aliis piscibus." (Brady on Boroughs, Appendix, 3, 4.) I have thus carried the fishery up to a period, much beyond all possible reach of Camden's pretended notice; but I can carry it still higher. Anthony Bec, who became bishop of Durham in 1283, and died bishop in 1311, but who seems to have been as stately almost as Wolsey kitchen, a larder, a cellar, a SHAVING-ROOM, with a BATH on the ground-floor below. The shaving-room seems a singular apartment to the mind of Wolsey himself, having the liveried army and the menial lord in equal attendance upon him; "once in London," says his historian, "paid down forty shillings for forty fresh herrings, when other nobles, then in parliament with him there, did not choose to purchase because of their over great dearness" (Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 746, "pro xl halceibus recentibus xl solidos Londoniæ semel solvit, aliis magnatibus, tunc in parlamento ibi consistentibus, pro nimia caristiâ emere non curantibus"). The dearness must appear astonishingly great, even to the judgment of the present age. Yet many years before, in 1238, we find Yarmouth pursuing the herring-fishery with all the celebrity that it does now, and the very neighbours of the Norwegians, the very borderers upon their seas, the very inhabitants of Gothland in Sweden, with the very Dutch themselves, coming to the fish-fair at Yarmouth every year. That year, says M. Paris, news came into the west of Europe, that the Tartars, under their kan, had overrun all the East, and ravaged Hungary; "unde Gothiam et Frisiam inhabitantes, impetus eorum pertimentes, in Angliam, ut moris est eorum apud Gernemue, tempore halecis capiendi, quo suas naves solebant onerare, non venerunt." (P. 398.) So great too was the demand from these Dutch and Swedish vessels, that, the exportation being thus prevented by accident, "halec, eo anno, in Angliâ," by a change in value strikingly the contrast of the rate above, "quasi pro nihilo præ abundantiâ habitum; sub quadragenario vel quinquagenario numero, licet optimum esset, pro uno argento," for one silver penny, "in partibus a mari etiam longinquis vendebatur." Herrings thus appear to have caught upon our own shores, salted by our own hands, and eaten by our own mouths, even sold in vast quantities to Friezelanders and to Swedes, before the year 1238. But in a still earlier year of that century, the 7th of king John, 1206, the townsmen of Dunwich, in Suffolk, had a remission of forty pounds for ever, of the fee-farm rent, paid by them before for their town, "to wit, out of a hundred and twenty pounds, and twenty-four thousand herrings, and one mark; so that they render to us and our heirs for the future in every year, eighty pounds, and twenty-four thousand herrings, and one mark" (Brady, ibid. p. 11, "viginti quatuor millia hallecum"). Even at the beginning of the very century preceding, Henry, the first bishop of Ely, who became bishop in 1108, on his partition of the abbey's property between himself and his monks, gave the monks "thirty thousand herrings of Dunwich" (Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 617: "xxx millia hallecum de Dunewycs"). So little reason is there for the rash assertion made by Camden, or even the soberer one made by Smith, in his History of Cork; that "the Hollanders were the first people in Europe, who observed the different seasons and returns of the herring fishery;" and that "the first regular fishery began as early as the year 1163!" We have seen the Friezelanders already coming to our herring-fishery at Yarmouth, and the Irish already salting their herrings before the Dutch. The herring-pies of my text carry the catching and the salting of herrings upon our own coast, as high as 1093-1077, even near a full of a modern in a community of monks. We should almost as soon expect to hear of what the use of tobacco had a little while ago introduced into the houses of our gentry, a smoking-room; or what has been more recently introduced in supersedence of the other, a powdering-room. Yet the shaving-room is clearly noticed in one of our monasteries: "Even to the time of this abbot Roger," says the Chronicle of Thorn, concerning St. Augustine's at Canterbury, in the reign of Henry III.; "the brethren shaved one another in the cloyster; but he, on account a full century above the reported commencement of the fishery among the Dutch. But, to fix the point beyond all possibility of doubt, let me observe from Camden himself; that the town of Dunwich, which we have just seen paying twenty-four thousand herrings to the king, in 1206, and thirty thousand to the abbey of Ely, in 1108, appears from Domesday Book to have actually paid the king at the making of it, sixty thousand herrings, "sexaginta millia allectum [allecum] de dono" (Camden, 339, translated by Mr. Gough himself, and even with a strange exaggeration, "nine hundred thousand herrings," ii. 76). I have thus traced the herring-fishery up to the Saxon period, and there I leave it.

In this argument I have not noticed, because I saw to be false, that "the herring-pies, which the lord of the manor of Carleton is bound to carry to court," as notes Mr. Gough, ii. 103, "are the fee-farm rents of the city of Norwich before it was incorporated," a fee-farm rent before incorporation!!! "when it was a great place, before Yarmouth was founded." Yet this very rent is instantly said by Mr. Gough himself, to have arisen from "the city having purchased the manor of Carleton." It was therefore no fee-farm rent for Norwich, either before or after it was incorporated, either before or after Yarmouth was founded. And at the close, we are once more told by Mr. Gough, that "the town of Yarmouth is by charter bound to send—these herrings." Such a jumble of inconsistencies have we here! The truth is, undoubtedly, that Yarmouth, not Norwich, is obliged by a charter, not made before Norwich was incorporated, because it had plainly been incorporated when Domesday Book was written (Brady, 4, 5), but later than Domesday Book itself, which mentions no such obligation on either Norwich or Yarmouth; later even than the Yarmouth charter of 1332 above, which equally mentions no such obligation; to send a great hundred of its first and fresh herrings (as it still sends them) to the city of Norwich, there to be baked (as they are at present) into twenty-four pasties, "pastellos centum halecum de primis" (Camden, 347), or "centum haleces recentes in viginti quatuor pastellis" (Gough, ii. 103), and thence to be conveyed (as they equally are at present) by the lord of Carleton to the king (Camden, 347; Gibson, 458, 459; Gough, ii. 103, 104). On the whole then the herrings, those Huns and Vandals of the fishy generation, appear to have always issued, as they still issue, from their retreats under the polar ice, in quest of food among freer seas; and to have always returned, as they now return, to their beds of repose, or breeding, during their polar length of nights.

“ of the cuts and various dangers which they frequently suffered, because “ they were rude and ignorant in the office of shaving, with the con“ sent of the convent ordered, that the shaving should be performed in “ a room close to the bathing-room, and by common barbers, whenever “ it was requisite; and that, on the days of shaving, three collects should “ be added to the convent’s devotions, in memory of Roger’s kindness “ and *for the salvation of Roger’s soul.” So roughly did these monks exercise their usurped office of barbers one upon another! such wounds did they mutually give and receive in their exercise of it! and such a real kindness was it in Roger to shift the scene of painful, even of dangerous operation, from the open cloyster to a retired room, and to call in the safe, smooth razors of professed barbers for the work! Priests, either regular or secular, always shaved, as appears from the anecdote so strikingly descriptive in itself, of Harold’s spies before the battle of Hastings reporting William’s army to be an army of priests, because the soldiers had no beards apparent †. Thus did our priests very early introduce among us the fashion which has now at last triumphed over the “ bearded majesty ‡” of our Saxonized warriors, by converting us all

* Twisden, 1915: “ Usque ad tempus hujus Rogeri abbatis, radēbant se mutuō fratres “ in claustrō; sed iste, propter læsuras et diversa pericula quæ frequenter contigerunt inter “ eos, quia rudes et nescii erant in officio radendī, ordinavit cum consensu conventus; quōd “ rasura fieret in camerā juxta balneatorium per seculares, quociens opus esset; et quōd, “ diebus rasuræ, post Verba mea in capitulō dicantur tres collectæ,—in memoriam illius “ beneficii, et pro animā Rogeri abbatis.” The “collects” were to be read “in capitulo,” in the congregation at church. In the History of Evesham, by Mr. Tindal, 1794, p. 193, “post capitulum conventūs” are supposed “to mean either a mass performed in the chapter- “house, or perhaps merely the greater mass, at which the whole convent was present.”
 They appear from my passage, they still more appear from Mr. Tindal’s own, as ordering what was to be done “on each day” by his monks to mean merely the convent prayers.
 Mr. Tindal argues convincingly against his former interpretation, that “one cannot suppose “a chapter was held every day;” and he might have argued as convincingly, that “a “mass” can equally not be supposed to be every day celebrated, and that “a greater mass,” still more strongly, cannot. Authors often hobble upon the crutches of learning for want of resolution to use their natural legs.

† Mat. Westm. 436: “ Omnes de exercitu illo presbyteros videri, cō quōd faciem “ totam cum utroque labio rasam haberent; unde Angli, nisi presbiteri, consuetudinem “ non habebant.”

‡ Gray’s Bard.

(in the language of the Saxon spies) into a nation of priests. The new fashion, equally sacerdotal in its origin and elegant in its aspect, commenced in the fourteenth century, and so provoked an order against it from the founder of New College in Oxford, one of his statutes expressly "prohibiting the custom of shaving the beard §." But at St. German's was no cloyster, and the shaving must therefore have been performed from the beginning within a room. St. German's; indeed, had no city near it, as St. Augustine's had, to furnish its corps of barbers for the large multitude of monks; yet had a small town, one barber from which would be fully competent for a community so much smaller. This town, too, could then support a much better barber than it can at present, because he would have all that attendance at the priory which is now cut off by the introduction of servants formally taught to shave their masters; and that very convenient practice of self-shaving, which has been lately introduced by our military gentlemen (I believe) among us, was never attempted then. Close to that shaving-room, we see, was the bathing-room at St. Augustine's. This will perhaps seem as extraordinary as the other, to our modern ideas. It seems in fact to be calculated for a climate much warmer than our own; and may reasonably therefore be argued, to have been derived with monkery itself from Egypt, that parent region of all monkery. Bathing, however, was assuredly enjoined, like a low diet, frequent fasts, and repeated blood-lettings, as an act of monastic discipline, as an operation of useful severity to the body, and an exertion of wholesome rigour upon the spirits. At one time, says accordingly a biographer of St. Neot, the saint was "standing in the well, in which he was daily wont to repeat "the whole Psalter throughout *." He is therefore represented in those windows of his church which exhibit his biography visible to the eye, as actually in the well up to the knees. But what carries assuredness into certainty at once, Adhelm, the famous founder of Malmesbury abbey in the end of the seventh century, and the first Saxon who wrote Latin

§ Life of Hearne, 103: "Statutum illud collegii Novi, Oxoniæ, in quo prohibetur "consuetudo radendi barbas."

* Some Account, 20, 21.

verses in this island, on becoming the prior of his own abbey, “used to plunge himself up to the shoulders,” says his historian, “into a well very near the monastery, to cut short the power of his rebel body; there he continued unshrinking for a whole night, minding neither the icy rigours of winter, nor the vapours exhaling from the marshes in summer; and he never terminated the discipline till he had chanted his Psalter throughout.*” So very similar was the conduct of both! But another of the monks practised the same severity, at the same time. “In another part of the town,” adds the historian, “is what is called Daniel’s Well, because Daniel, who was afterwards made bishop when Adhelm was, used to keep these heavenly watches in it by night †.” The severity of discipline in these was greater than in Neot; he sitting in the well by day with the water up to his knees, only, but they standing in it up to their shoulders by night. Either way, however, such a situation in the act of prayer seems amazing to the mind and astonishing to the spirit of an age like our own, peculiarly distinguished by its attention to bodily ease, and its repugnance to bodily rigours. But the high tone of devoutness in these hermitical or monastic men, considered severity to the body as a stimulus to the soul, as, therefore, an accompaniment serviceable to prayer, and as presenting the body with the soul, an agreeable oblation to God. Equally at Litchfield, as Leland informs us, “is St. Chadde’s well, a springe of pure water, where is seene a stone in the bottome of it, on the whiche some saye St. Chadde was wont naked to stand in the water and praye. At this stone Chad had his oratory, in the tyme of Wulpher kinge of the Merches,” or Mercia ‡. So plainly were the baths in monasteries, calculated merely for a monastic exercise of discipline! Nor let us smile at the supposed

* Anglia Sacra, ii. 13: “Ut vim rebelli corpori conscinderet, fonti, qui proximus monasterio, se humero tenuis immergebat; ibi nec glaciale in hyeme rigorem, nec æstate nebulas ex locis palustribus halantes, curans, noctes durabat inoffensus; finis duntaxat percantati Psalterii terminum imponebat labori.”

† Ibid. ibid. “In aliâ parte urbis, Fons Danielis dicitur; quia in eo Daniel ecclæstes noctibus ducebat excubias, qui cum Aldelmo pontificales accepit infulas.” Daniel’s and Adhelm’s wells remained with their names respectively annexed, to the days of Leland (De Script. Brit. 92).

‡ Itin. iv. 117.

folly of this practice, either from such indulgence to our bodily feelings, as shrinks before all austerities however requisite; or from such an ignorance of the views of religion, as knows not it is calculated for the recovery of a fallen being; or from such a poor, creeping philosophy as is too ignorant and too indulgent to wish for any recovery at all, hating, therefore, the very sun of Christianity over its head, and earthing from it in the very darkness of deism*. Such strong self-denials as these, indeed, could never be practised by the generality even of real Christians. They have been always reserved for the few who wished to work up their souls into a religious abstraction from the body, in order to mix more freely in an union of fraternal devoutness with the angels, and to enjoy more fully an union of filial affectionateness with God himself.

But, above all, a literary mind is strongly impelled to inquire, where was the LIBRARY of this incorporated society of scholars. Yet, on such an inquiry, perhaps, the credulity of protestantism will stare with an air of foolish wonder at the simplicity prompting it. Monks, indeed, had their ignorance and their illiterateness as well as our own clergy, and even as much as our most protestant ministers of the dissension have†.

Yet

* I here allude to a speech, which Deism may well make to Christianity :

. To thee I call,
But with no friendly voice, and add thy name,
O sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams,
That bring to my remembrance from what state
I fell.

† Leland's Coll. iv. 60: "Apud Franciscanos," at Oxford, "sunt telæ araneæ in bibliothecâ; præterea, tineæ et blattæ: amplius, quicquid alii jactent, nihil, si species "eruditos libros. Nam ego, in vitis fratribus omnibus, curiosè bibliothecæ forulos omnes "excussi." This passage is as curious as it is unknown: but the pointedness of it is increased in his work De Script. Brit. 286: "Id temporis fui Oxonii," he there says, "ut "copiam peterem videndi bibliothecam Franciscanorum; ad quod obstupuerunt asini aliquot, "rudentes nulli prorsus mortalium licere tam sanctos aditus et recessus adire, et mysteria "videre, nisi gardiano, sic enim præsidem suum vocant, et sacris sui collegii baccalaureis. "Sed ego urgebam, et principis diplomate munitus, tantùm non coegi ut sacraria illa aperirent. "Tum unus ex majoribus asinis, multa subrudens, tandem fores ægrè reseravit. Summe "Jupiter !

Yet we find them, not perhaps as generally learned as our own clergy are at present, and not even as the ministers of the dissension are; but still exhibiting some individuals as learned as any of either; as much practised too in the arts of composition, and as ready to inform their cotemporaries by their publications, a BEDE, a MALMESBURY, and a PARIS. When such men could be formed in the bosom of a monastery, the monastic libraries must have been furnished with books, in quantity and in quality almost equal to our own. The late historian of St. Alban's abbey, therefore, argues in the very face of fact, when he says, a "desire to excel" in studiousness and in learning, "could not be cultivated with effect in the monasteries, because the continual duty of the choir occupied their whole time, and allowed no vacant hours for private study§." The existence of his own historian, PARIS, decisively proves the contrary. The great length, or the frequent recurrence of the church-services, indeed, hardly occupied more of their hours in a day than our morning walks, our morning rides, or our morning calls, our dinner-visits in the afternoon, our tea-drinkings in the evening, our clubs or our plays at night, occupy with ourselves at present. Yet my late unhappy friend Mr. Gibbon, who first solicited my acquaintance from my publication in 1771, by a letter amicably controverting some positions it; with whom I afterwards spent many an hour, and exchanged many a letter of literary friendliness, during an intercourse of four or five years; by whom (let me assume the honour due to myself) the poor scepticism of his spirit was carefully kept a secret to me all the time, though I began to suspect it at last; from whom I even received the favour of perusing, at my own leisure, his History in manuscript, then prosecuted into a part of the second volume, but industriously gutted of every thing very offensive; and to whom I remonstrated upon his sending me the first volume printed in 1776, so boldly and so keenly

"Jupiter! quid ego illie inveni? Pulverem autem inveni, telas arancarum, lineas, luttas, situm denique et squalorem. Inveni etiam et libros, sed quos tritus obolis libenter non emerem.—Roberti episcopi volumina et exemplaria omnia, ingenti olim pretio comparata," by bishop Grostest himself, and left in his will to this library, "furto ab ipsis Franciscanis, huc illuc ex præscripto commigrantibus,—sullata sunt." Yet this very society, let us remember, had previously produced Roger Bacon.

§ Newcome, 231.

in a couple of letters, on his impious effrontery against Christianity, as broke off our friendly intercourse for ever; he who laid out his splendour of talents peculiarly in the self-deceptive glitter of eloquence, thus overpowered the solar light of his own judgment, and caught himself as larks are caught in France and in England at times, by the dazzling reflection of a mirror*; who therefore, from principle, wandered away into popery at first, then from sensuality turned off into Mahometanism (I believe) afterwards, but at last retired into a Roman kind of frigidly philosophical heathenism, and settled finally (I fear) in the central darkness of atheism itself; who, in this fluctuation of intellect and conduct, began to write his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, so burst out like a comet upon the world of religion,

. And from his horrid hair
Shook pestilence and war, that worst of pestilences, infidelity, with that worst of wars, one against God himself; under all this wildly devious eccentricity of his spirit, and amid all the common or the parliamentary avocations of his mind, did he compose no less than six volumes, or nearly four thousand pages in quarto. And with the monastic avocations did a Paris, moving like the sun in a regular orbit, never glaring, always shining, with an attachment to truth, to principle, to utility, infinitely greater than Mr. Gibbon's, draw up his Latin histories of the kingdom and the abbey, in nearly twelve hundred pages folio. “Quantum ceteris ad suas res “obeundas, quantum ad festos ludorum celebrandos, quantum ad alias “voluptates et ad ipsam requiem animi et corporis, conceditur tem“porum; quantum alii tribuunt tempestivis conviviis, quantum denique

* “We travelled part of the way,” says Mr. Swinburne, on his return from Spain, ii. 415, and in an excursion from Nismes to Arles, “in a rich plain, where a great number of “fowlers were stationed, turning small mirrors in order to dazzle the larks, and draw them “down within reach of their guns.” Nor is the practice confined to France: Spenser alludes to it as English, in his Fairy Queen, vii. 6, 47 :

Like darred larke, not daring up to looke
On her whose sight before so much he sought.

And a glass made use of in catching larks is called “a daring-glass” (note to Church's edition, in 1757).

“alcae,

“aleæ, quantum pilæ; tantum mihi egomet,” might such a monk exclaim with Cicero, “ad hæc studia recolenda sumpsit †.”

Yet “it is to be observed,” cries the historian of St. Alban’s again, “that, among all the rooms and buildings belonging to the abbey, there “was none called the library; the scarcity of books rendered this unnecessary.” All, however, is inferred merely from one notice thus taken from the original historian; that abbot Symond, in the twelfth century, “provided a great number of very fair and reputable books, “among others the Old and New Testament much embellished;” and “caused a place to be made for these books, called the almonry, opposite the tomb of Roger the hermit, somewhere within the body of “the church ‡.” But the inference is unjust in itself, and the observation is void of truth. That the inference is unjust, a similar account of a former abbot shews us; who “gave to this church twenty-eight “notable volumes, and eight psalters, a collectary, an epistolary, a book “containing the Gospel lessons for the whole year, and two texts,” or complete volumes of the Scriptures, “ornamented with gold and silver, “and gems; besides ordinals, consuetudinaries, missals, troparies, col- “lectaria, and other books, which are kept in presses,” within the church, for the immediate use of it; “and besides relics, philacteries, “palls, copes, albs, and various other ornaments,” equally kept in the † Oratio pro Archiâ, 13.

‡ Newcome, 75. The words of the original are these, p. 1036: “non desiit libros “optimos, et volumina authentica et glossata, tam Novi quàm Veteris Testamenti (qui- “bus non vidimus nobiliora);” not, as Mr. Newcome has vaguely rendered the words, “very fair and reputable books,” but “the finest books;” and not, “among others, the Old “and New Testament much embellished,” but, still referring books and volumes equally to the Bible, “volumes authentic” in their readings, and “glossed” upon their margins, “being the Old Testament” in one volume, and the “New” in another, “than which I “never saw nobler” volumes; “scribere, et ad unguem irreprehensibiliter præparare; “quorum numerum, longum foret explicare.” That the “libri” and the “volumina” refer to the same object, is plain from p. 1038; where the expression is simply this: “librorum “optimorum copiam impretriabilem ad unguem præparavit.” But, as the author proceeds in the first passage, “qui eosdem libros videre desiderat, in almario picto,” or, as in p. 1038, “in speciali almario—picturato,” not, as Mr. Newcome speaks, “in a place—called “the Almonry,” a version egregiously absurd, but “in a painted press,” or book-case, “quod est in ecclesiâ.”

church,

church for use*. The other books were reposit in another place, and this place was the library of course. Thus Leland speaks of the canons of Barnwell, near Cambridge, and notes "the library at "Barnwell;" then mentions "the library of the Austin monks" at Cambridge, "the library of the Dominicans, and the library of the "Franciscans," there; specifying under each some of the books. He thus proceeds to mention a monastery at Thetford, and to specify some books in its library, does just the same at Norwich, at Walsingham, at Croyland, and at Peterborough; but occasionally varies his manner, notices no library, but speaks under each monastery of some of its books, "with the friers preachers" at Norwich, "with the Franciscans," and "with the Carmelites," enumerating several books, as in their respective libraries, of course†. Thus, at "Hely" we have "Liber Variarum Cassiodori," &c.; at "Walden" we have "Beda super Cantica Canticorum," &c. and at "the abbey of St. Alban's, Alexander Necham," &c. &c. &c.‡. We find even the very appellation of library applied to a room in this abbey; and the public collection of books for the use of the whole society, expressly mentioned upon one occasion, even a very early one. Paul, who was made abbot in 1077, "when he "had liberally bestowed upon the aforesaid warrior," says Paris, concerning one who had given some tithes to the abbey, and on whom the abbot, in return, bestowed his LIBRARY, previously furnished; "immediately caused some peculiarly chosen books to be written§." The

* Paris, 1003: "Dedit—huic ecclesie viginti octo volumina notabilia, et octo psalteria, "collectarium, epistolarium, et librum in quo continentur Evangelia legenda per annum, "[et] duos textus auro et argento et gemmis ornatos; sine ordinalibus, consuetudinariis, "missalibus, tropariis, collectariis, et aliis libris, qui in almariolis habentur; et absque "reliquiis, phylacteriis, pallis, capis, albis, et aliis variis ornamentis."

† Leland's Coll. iv. 14: "In bibliothecâ Bernwellensi," "in bibliothecâ Augustinensium;" "in bibliothecâ Dominicanorum;" p. 15, "in bibliothecâ Franciscanorum;" p. 25, "Teoforde—, in bibliothecâ;" p. 27, "in bibliothecâ Christicolarum Nordowici;" p. 29, "Walsingham,—in bibliotheca," "Croyland,—in bibliothecâ;" p. 31, "Peterburg,—in bibliothecâ;" p. 28, "apud prædicatores," "apud Franciscanos," "apud Carmelitas."

‡ Coll. iv. 163. "Hely, Liber Variarum Cassiodori," and "Walden, Beda super Cantica Canticorum," and "Cœnobium S. Albani,—Alexander Necham super," &c.

§ Paris, 1003: "Postquam—præfato militi librarium suum, primò paratum, liberaliter "contulerat, continuò—libros præ-electos scribi fecit."

library given was equally belonging to the whole society, as the books ordered to be written were, and as the tithes for which the return was made. All were the property of the abbey; the abbot therefore had the same power over them, as he had over the other property; and the new books were to supply the place of the old. This passage however, explicit as it is for the existence of a library even so early at St. Alban's, with an astonishing dexterity of negligence has Mr. Newcome suppressed entirely in the main point; even though he mentions all the attendant circumstances†. Nor is this the only mention that we find made, of the library at St. Alban's. Mr. Newcome himself, with an equally astonishing forgetfulness of all that he has said before, in another place says of an abbot, that he "made great addition to the library, by "the acquisition of many books‡." And, what aggravates the inconsistency, the principal word in the original is the very same, which he has translated almonry before, and on the authority of which he has denied the very existence of a library here§. His own evidence, therefore, is decisive against himself. But let us turn to others.

Even in the Monasticon, even in its brief account of this very abbey, we find an ancient manuscript of the Bodleian actually reciting the Latin verses, that were inscribed upon the windows of the abbey "in the library-room *." So careless has Mr. Newcome been, in overlooking the notices given by two works, that must have been ever before his eyes, ever in his hands,

Nocturnâ versata manu, versata diurnâ, while he was writing his history; and even speaking himself, in full contradiction to them! We can the less wonder therefore, that he has overlooked another work, which was not so immediately requisite for his inspection, but which ought to have been particularly consulted. That "Coryphæus" in our ecclesiastical antiquities, he who seems as a giant in our sight, while we are as grasshoppers before him, even Leland, speaks of this library also, and in moments just antecedent to the destruction of the

† P. 48.

‡ Newcome, 121.

§ Paris. 1058: "Almariolo."

* Monasticon, i. 183: "In fenestris in domo librariâ monasterii prædicti."

abbey. "About ten years ago," he tells us, "I repaired to Verulam, for inspecting with a curious eye the ruins of the old municipium of the Romans; which when I had done, I turned aside to St. Alban's abbey, near to the walls of the fallen city. Here, indeed, a monk elegantly learned, whose name was Kingsbury, a man very fond of all antiquities, with great attentiveness shewed me the parchment treasures of this vast monastery; among which appeared †," &c. Or, as the passage may not seem sufficiently explicit to the anti-monastical reader, let me recite what Leland says in another place concerning this visit to the abbey; "I was several days at St. Alban's, a monastery situated near the walls of the deserted Verulam, that I might extract some notes of the antiquities of Britain, from the treasures of the celebrated library which is there ‡." So expressly is this very library mentioned! So expressly is it pronounced to have been very celebrated too! And so very grossly mistaken is Mr. Newcome, in denying its existence!

This great, this mitred abbey, was sure to have one, when its very cell of Tinmouth had §. There was, we may be sure from such a cell possessing one, scarce any monastery so insignificant in itself, as not to contain a library within its walls. Malmesbury expressly informs us of conventual "churches, in which were contained from ancient days libraries, stocked with a number of books, but burnt with their books by the † Leland De Script. Brit. 317: "Annis abhinc plus minus decem, Verolanium me contuli, municipii veteris Romani ruinas curiosè inspecturus; quod cùm fecissem, diverſi ad Fanum Albani, muris collapsæ urbis vicinum. Hic me [superfluous!] quidem monachus eleganter eruditus, cui a regiâ curiâ nomen, vir antiquitatis omnis studiosissimus, thesauros pergamenicos monasterii ingentis officiosissimus mihi ostendit. Inter quos et," &c.

‡ Leland De Script. Brit. 166: "Agebam dies aliquot apud Fanum Albani, monasterium propter muros deserti Verolamii situm, ut aliquid antiquitatis Britannicæ e thesauris bibliothecæ quæ ibidem celebris est, eruerem."

§ Leland's Coll. iii. 403: "In bibliothecâ Tinemutensi." That this was a cell to St. Alban's, even Mr. Newcome informs us; as "at this time also," he says, p. 47, "Robert de Mowbray, earl of Northumberland, caused certain monks of this church" of St. Alban, "to dwell in the church of St. Mary at Tinmouth,—and there constitute a cell subordinate to this church."

“Danes ||.” We even observe books brought into England for sale, so early as the year 705 ¶. So early as that very century too, the eighth, we see learning to have been prosecuted more successfully in England than in France, at York than at Tours *. Then did the archbishop’s library at York accordingly contain within it, the Fathers Greek and Latin, the Latin and Greek Classics, the Commentators, the Grammarians, and moderns; all collected in journies upon the continent. And as far as we can judge from a poetical catalogue of it, the oldest catalogue perhaps existing in all the regions of literature, certainly the oldest existing in England, yet drawn up at the very time by a first-rate scholar, of a name still retained in the north, Alcuin or Alkin; TROGUS POMPEIUS, that Augustan writer of an Universal History in five-and-forty volumes †, who is ranked by such as had read him with Sallust, Livy, or Tacitus, who is cited frequently by so late a writer as Orosius, but is supposed to have been lost soon afterwards, and has actually disappeared with all his volumes to these later ages, was plainly preserved in this library, as he is expressly specified in this catalogue; being specified equally with Livy himself, equally without any reference to their respective epitomizers Justin or Florus, and equally without any dismemberments in themselves. It is mournfully pleasing under the loss of such historians in part or in whole, to point at a period in which they were not lost, to continue it as long as we possibly can, and to shew how

|| Malmesbury, f. 24: “Ecclesiæ, in quibus numerosæ a prisco bibliothecæ continebantur, cum libris a Danis incensæ.”

¶ Gale, i. 355.

* Alcuinus alias Albinus, a native and scholar of York, but invited over to Tours in France by Charlemagne, in a letter to this monarch, desires, “ut aliquos ex pueris nostris remittam, qui excipiant nobis inde necessaria quæque, et revelant in Franciam flores Britannicæ; ut non sit tantummodo in Euboricâ civitate ortus conclusus, sed in Turonicâ emissæcines Paradisei cum pomorum fructibus, ut veniens Auster perficere [possit] hortos Ligeri fluminis.” Leland’s Coll. ii. 399.

† Præfatio Justinî: “Vir prisæ eloquentiæ, Trogi Pompeius, Græcus et totius orbis historias Latino sermone composuit.—Horum igitur quatuor et quadraginta voluminum (nam totidem edidit),—cognitione quæque dignissima excerpti.” near they were transmitted to our own times by the libraries of the clergy †. We † Gale, i. 730. This catalogue Alcuin himself calls in a letter (Coll. ii. 399), “exquiritiores scholasticæ eruditionis libellos, quos habui in patriâ per bonam et devotissimam “magistri mei industriam, vel etiam mei ipsius qualemcunque sudorem;” Ethelbert, master of the school at York, afterwards archbishop of the see, having formed the library, and leaving it at his death to Alcuin. (Gale, i. 730.)

Illic invenies veterum vestigia Patrum, Quidquid habet pro se Latio Romanus in orbe, Græcia vel quidquid transmisit clara Latinis;
 Hebraicus vel quod populus bibit imbre superno,
 Africa lucifluo vel quidquid lumine sparsit;
 Quod pater Hieronymus, quod sensit Hilarius, atque
 Ambrosius præsul, simul Augustinus, et ipse Sanctus Athanasius, quod Orosius edit aventus, Quidquid Gregorius summus docet, et Leo papa,
 Basilius quidquid, Fulgentius atque, coruscant, Cassiodorus item, Chrysostomus atque Johannes;
 Quidquid et Athelmus docuit, quid Beda Magister, Quæ Victorinus scripsere, Boetius atque;
 Historici veteres, POMPEIUS, Plinius * ipse;
 Acer Aristoteles, rhetor quoque Tullius ingens;
 Quid quoque Sedulius, vel quid canit ipse Juvencus, Alcuinus, et Clemens, Prosper, Paulinus, Arator, Quid Fortunatus, vel quid Lactantius, redunt;
 Quæ Maro Virgilius, Statius, Lucanus, et auctor
 Artis Grammaticæ, vel quid scripsere Magistri, Quid Probus, atque Focas, Donatus, Priscianusve, Servius, Euticius, Pompeius, Comminianus.
 Invenies alios perplures, lector, ibidem,
 Egregios studiis, arte, et sermone magistros,
 Plurima qui claro scripsere volumina sensu;
 Nomina sed quorum præsentis in carmine scribi,
 Longius est visum quam plectri postulet usus.

These books were what he had purchased abroad (p. 729) :

Non semel externas peregrino tramite terras
 Jam peragravit ovans, sophiæ deductus amore;
 Siquid fortè novi librorum seu studiorum,
 Quod secum ferret, terris reperiret in illis.

* Livius.

We find also other libraries in other ages of our monasteries, dispensing, like so many moons, their collected illumination through that (as vulgarly reported) polar night of darkness. Thus we find the library of the Carmelite or White Friars to have had, besides divinity, besides Giraldus's Topography of Wales, and besides Higden's History, "a very ancient copy of Solinus," Frontinus's Book of Stratagems, and Macrobius *; that of Ely, besides divinity, besides history, to have had Vitruvius's Architecture and Antoninus's Itinerary †; that at Colchester, to have had "almost all the Latin poets ‡;" that at Edmundsbury, "a very "ancient manuscript of Sallust," the Architecture of Vitruvius, and the Laws of the Lombards §. We find also the Categories of Aristotle, and the Timæus of Plato, at Glastonbury ||; "a very fair manuscript of "Terence," at Wells ¶; some of Galen's writings, and a treatise translated out of Arabic into Latin, at Bath ; and "an ancient manuscript "of Terence," at Lanthony ††; with a variety of others, specified by Leland himself, as rare even in his age, and singular even in his eyes. But to raise our view above that minuteness of vision, which diminishes the size of the object even in shewing it more clearly, and to present it in its full volume of magnitude to the eye; let me produce some general accounts of the frequency or the largeness of these clerical libraries. Even common churches, such as St. Peter's on Cornhill in London, St. Mary's in Warwick, and Pontefract in Yorkshire; Sherborne in Dorsetshire, Cirencester in Gloucestershire, Abingdon in Berkshire, and Coggeshall in

In Coll. iv. 36, we find this account of the library, as it was in the days of Leland: "In "bibliothecâ S. Petri, quam Flaccus Albinus, alias Alcuinus, subinde miris laudibus extollit "propter insignem copiam librorum, tum Latinorum, tum Græcorum; jam ferè honorum "librorum nihil est: exhausti enim hos thesauros (ut pleraque alia) et Danica immanitas et "Gulielmi Nothi violentia."

* Leland's Coll. iv. 53, 54: "Solini vetustissimum exemplar."

† Ibid. 163.

‡ Ibid. 162: "Omnes fere Latini poetæ."

§ Ibid. 162, 163: "Vetustiss. codice Sallustii."

|| Ibid. 155.

¶ Ibid. ibid.: "Terentius pulcherrimus."

 Ibid. 157.

†† Ibid. 159: "Terentius, vetus codex."

Essex; Woburn and Warden in Bedfordshire, Windham near Norwich, Bridlington in Yorkshire, with Stratford-Bow; had all their respective libraries ††. Nor let all for the sake of these be thought, in the violence of prejudice struggling against conviction, to be mean and petty libraries, the mere studia of our schools at present. Some of them were so in their origin, as the seven-mouthed Nile issues from a small spring, and flows in a little rill, at first. Thus, at the Franciscan friery of London, more than a century before the erection of its library, “Bogo Bond, herald, king at arms, builded the musæum,” or in Stowe’s language, more humbly as it sounds to our ears at present, yet very apposite as it is in itself, “the studies,” for what is denominated still the study in the language of the judicious, but arrogates the title of library from the silly and the vain, even for a room full of books among the middle ranks of life*. Some also of those libraries which have been mentioned last, we actually know to have been well furnished with books||, and others we find to have been still better furnished. The abbey at Leicester, and the priory at Dover, had each a library of no mean or petty size; we can appeal in proof to the best of all testimonies, the very catalogues of their books yet remaining in the Bodleian†. The library of the Augustine monks at Canterbury, as Leland expressly informs us, was “a rich ma-gazine of ancient volumes;” because, as he adds, “Augustine collected “by his friends in Italy many volumes both Latin and Greek, and took “care to have them sent him, all of which he left at death to his monks, “as pledges of his kindness towards them; the Greek are lost partly by “violence of times, partly by fire, partly too by theft; but as to the “Latin, written after the manner of the ancients in the large kind of Ro-

†† Itin. vii. 131; viii. 28; and De Script. Brit. 400, 165, 213, 238, 212, 405, 343, 334, 202, 249.

* Leland’s Coll. i. 108: “Bogo Bond, heraldus, rex armorum, condidit museum.” Stowe’s London, 341: “Mr. Bevis Bond, herald, and king at armes, builded the studies.”

|| De Script. Brit. 343: “Ad Triburnam cœnobium Bernardinorum,—thesauros perga-menicos paulò ante igne consumptos,” ibid. “Verodunum, ubi et monasterium quoque “Bernardinorum, ac bibliotheca antiquis refertissima exemplaribus,” 334, “Bibliothecâ “Verodunensi, optimis refertissimâ exemplaribus.”

† Tanner, preface, p. xxv. xxvi.

“ man characters, these even now remain, presenting an incredibly majestic air of antiquity in their aspect, namely, two volumes containing “ the four Gospels; but in a version different from that of the Vulgate, a “ Psalter dedicated even by Jerome himself to Damasus the Roman “ pontiff, which I would willingly believe to be indeed the very original, “ besides two most elegant commentaries on the Psalms, which from “ their too great age admit no reader, except one that is very keen-eyed †.” So careful were the monks in general, of preserving their literary treasures, concealing them from enemies, rescuing them from fires, and vindicating them from moths or worms§! We have even another instance of their care, and I note it to carry on the chain of intelligence down into later ages. “ A few years ago,” as Leland tells us, “ I was “ in the library at Bath; where I found some books not void of learning, “ the treasures of venerable antiquity, given (as appeared from the inscriptions) in presents from king Athelstan himself to the monks; one “ of them, because it was upon papal synods, and I was struck with the “ antiquity and majesty of the work, I transferred to the royal library of “ the most illustrious king Henry VIII. ||.”

But

† De Script. Brit. 299, 300: “ Augustinianam bibliothecam, id est, divitem veterum exemplariorum officinam—: Augustinus—multa cum Latina tum Græca exemplaria per “ amicos in Italiâ comparavit, et ad se deferenda curavit, quæ omnia moriens, tanquam virtutis pignora, monachis suis reliquit; Græca partim violentiâ temporis, partim igne, partim etiam furto sublata sunt; ex Latinis autem codicibus, majasculis literis Romanis more “ veterum scriptis, hi etiam nunc extant, incredibilem præ se ferentes antiquitatis majestatem, videlicet, duo volumina quatuor Evangelia complectentia, sed alius quàm vulgaris interpretationis, Psalterium etiam ab ipso Hieronymo, Damaso pontifici Romano dedicatum, “ quod quidem vel archetypum esse libenter crediderim, insuper duo elegantissimi in Psalmos “ commentarii, qui præ nimia vetustate lectorem non admittunt nisi oculatissimum.”

§ Leland, in p. 300, blames the very monks of Canterbury for particular wastefulness, concerning the books not preserved; when surely the preservation of these amidst those ravages of war, by which the monastery was burnt in 1168, “ que calamitas,” says Leland himself, “ magnam vim bonorum autorum, ut idem [Thornus] est testis, abstulit,” is a sufficient justification of them.

|| Leland, 160: “ Paucis abhinc annis fui in Badmensi bibliotheca, ubi reperi aliquot “ non indoctos libros, venerande vetustatis thesauros, ab ipso Ethelstano, ut ex inscriptionibus apparuit, monachis dono datos; ex illis unum, captes et in antiquitate temerè reser- “ operis, erat enim de synodis pontificiis, in p. latinam bibliothecam illustrissimum regis Hen- “ ricus.”

But the monks were not only careful of what they had got, they actually travelled abroad to procure more. Thus Thomas Walden, a Carmelite, who went by the order of Henry V. to the council of Constance, who was equally present at the council of Pisa, and died in 1430; had collected such a number of books in his travels, that “he bequeathed to “the Carmelites of London as many volumes of excellent authors, “written in the larger kind of Roman characters, as that age estimated at “two thousand pounds in the least: whence it comes, however the number of books be remarkably diminished at present, that there is yet no “library in London which can vie with the Carmelite, either in the multitude or in the antiquity of its volumes ¶.” But let me recite another fact of the same nature, as they serve to open a new world of notices upon our Protestant eyes. William Tilly a monk of Canterbury obtained leave from his abbot to travel into Italy; set out, studied the civil and canon law at Bologna, formed a friendship with Politian there, and “never remitting for a moment his efforts of industry or his measures of “expense, collected many volumes of Greek; nor was he less vigorous in “purchasing Latin manuscripts, yet only those of ancient date; which “he brought with him to Canterbury not long afterwards, as treasures “plainly unparalleled.—A few years ago one Leighton a pettifogger, accompanied with a lewd and rash rabble, came to quarter at Canterbury, and was received hospitably by the abbot. But at midnight, “from the negligence and drunkenness of Leighton’s servants, the abbey

“rici Octavi transtuli.” So in Coll. iv. 154, we have at Glastonbury, “Grammatica Euticis, liber olim S. Dunstani.” Thus were kept to the Reformation in several libraries, translations from Latin into English made under the countenance of king Alfred; “vel hodie hujusmodi translationes in non paucis bibliothecis extant, venerandam præ se ferentes antiquitatem.” (De Script. Brit. 100.) And at Malmesbury was kept equally to the same period, “Davidis Psalterium, literis Saxoniceis,” that is, the Roman letters disfigured into Saxon (Hist. of Manchester, ii. quarto, 331, 332), “longiusculis scriptum;” which had belonged to Adhelm, a scholar much earlier than either Dunstan or Alfred.

¶ De Script. Brit. 441: “Tot nobilium autorum volumina, majusculis literis Romanis scripta, Carmelitis nostræ urbis ex testamento reliquit, quot illa ætas duobus ad minimum aurorum millibus æstimavit; unde, quamvis jam insigniter diminutus sit librorum numerus, nulla tamen est Londini bibliotheca, quæ, vel multitudine vel antiquitate exemplariorum, cum Carmelitana conferri possit.”

“ was

“ was suddenly set on fire and burned ; in the highest story of the house “ was Tilly’s treasure of books repositied, and now, to the very great in“ jury of the studious, destroyed. In this destruction, they say THE “ LONG-LOST TREATISE OF TULLY DE REPUBLICA WAS REDUCED TO “ ASHES *.”

Thus ranging actively abroad in quest of books, the spirit of the monks (we may be sure) was doubly active at home. We accordingly find a remarkable instance of this. The library at Ramsey, a place now almost unknown to the topographer of England, was celebrated for what we are amazed to hear of either there or then, its stock of Hebrew books, and merely from an attention of this nature. The Jews, being for the first time permitted to pass over from Normandy into England by the Conqueror, spread in a short time over the kingdom, just as they are now spread, and had, as they now have, a synagogue in almost every great town of it ; but, in the reign of Edward I. all their property was tyrannically confiscated, and they themselves were barbarously banished. “ Then, the synagogues at Huntingdon and Stamford being profaned, all “ their furniture came under the hammer for sale, together with their treasures of books †. But when Gregory” Huntingdon, a monk of Ramsey, who had been studying the Hebrew language for some time before, and been checked in his studies by the want of Hebrew books,

* De Script. Brit. 482 : “ Et industriæ et impensis nullum certè locum relinquens, Græca exemplaria multa conquisivit ; nec minori ullâ curâ in conradendis Latinis, sed antiquæ notæ, codicibus usus est ; quos nec longo post tempore, tanquam thesaurus planè incomparabiles, secum deduxit, Durovernum repetens.—Annis abhinc paucis Legidunus leguleius, iniquâ et temerariâ comitatus turbâ, Durovernum hospes venit ; humanissimè a præside fani servatoris acceptus est. Sed nocte intempestâ, negligentia et temulentia ejus servorum, ædes subito igne correptæ conflagraverunt. In quarum supremo tabulatu thesaurus librorum Tillæi reconditus unâque exhaustus, maximo studiosorum incommodo. Ferunt hâc elade Ciceronis desideratissimum De Republicâ volumen in cineres redactum fuisse.” For the last incident we have another evidence : “ In those dayes—did utterly “ perish—at Canterbury—that wonderful work of the sage and eloquent Cicero De Republicâ.” (Dr. Dee to Q. Elizabeth, 1556, in Joannes Glastoniensis, ii. 490.)

† De Script. Brit. 321, 322 : “ Tum, synagogis profanatis Venantoduni et Stenofordas, “ supellex omnis sub hastâ venum exposita, unâ cum librorum thesauris.”

“ understood of this auction, he hastily repaired to it from his adjoining “ monastery with a good sum of money, and readily at the fixed price “ purchased their gold for his brass, and returned home in high spirits.
 “ What did he do then? Night and day he turned over his Hebrew “ volumes, till he had drawn from the very fountain-head a more inti“ mate knowledge of the language. He left also to his colleagues many “ excellent annotations from his own pen, which a learned posterity “ might read with pleasure. The catalogue of Ramsey library makes a “ specific and an honourable mention, of the Hebrew books most diligently “ collected by him ‡.” He thus begun that collection, which afterwards received considerable additions from Robert Dodford, another monk of the abbey §; and had even a Hebrew Lexicon compiled from both, by a third. Laurence Holbech, in the reign of Henry IV. “ lighting upon “ the Hebrew volumes, which had been rescued from destruction as “ purchased with money formerly by the remarkable care of Gregory—, “ and which exhibited all the glorious majesty of the ancient synagogue ;”
 he resolved, that “ what Gregory had happily begun in the Hebrew “ language, he would more happily complete,” and therefore “ formed “ in an elegant manner a Hebrew Dictionary, a work at once refined and “ learned; which was carried away a few years ago, by the wicked in“ dustry of a purloiner, Robert Wachefeld. John Cluld, lately a monk “ of Ramsey, when the abbey and its noble library were sinking in one “ common ruin, preserved the Hebrew books from destruction *.” Such an

‡ De Script. Brit. 322: “ Ubi autem Gregorius hanc auctionem factam esse intellexerat, “ vicinus atque idem nummatus festinanter accurrit, ac, dato pretio, aurea pro æreis faciliè “ comparavit, et lætissimus domum rediit. Quid tum ille? Nocturnâ versabat manu, “ versabat diurnâ, Hebræa exemplaria; donec penitientem linguæ cognitionem ex ipsis “ exhausisset fontibus. Reliquit autem suis symmistis multa egregiè calamo annotata, “ quæ docta cum voluptate legeret posteritas. Librorum Hebraicorum ab eo diligen“ tissimè collectorum, catalogus bibliothecæ Rameseganz luculentam juxta ac honorificam “ mentionem facit.”

§ Ibid. 322: “ Sed et idem catalogus accuratè recenset Hebraicos thesauros, divina “ volumina, a Roberto Dodefordo, monacho Ramesegano, religiosè comparatos.”

* Ibid. 452: “ Inciderat in exemplaria quædam Hebraica, synagogæ veteris majesta“ tem eximiam illam referentia, comparata quidem et ab interitu olim conservata insigni “ industriâ Gregorii.—Cum hôte scriptore fuit pia quædam Laurentio invidia, ut quod “ ille

an illustrious society of Hebrew scholars, was this sequestered abbey, of Ramsey; and such a Christian Sion was raised, amidst the eastern lakes of our island; till the Reformation swept away this Sion, and made that study of the Hebrew, which seems to have begun with the beginnings of the Saxon church *, which was now culminating rapidly to its zenith, to set in the ocean for a century and a half afterwards †.

Having thus shewn the numerousness and the valuableness of the books repositied in our monasteries, let us throw open the doors of the rooms in which they were lodged, dart our eyes of curiosity down the length of them, and then estimate the consequence of books to the society from the reception of these guests within it. “Thomas Bubwith,” says Leland in his Itinerary, but means Nicholas Bubwith, who became bishop of Wells in 1407, and died in 1424, “made the est part of the cloyster, with the litle chapel beneth, and the great librarie over it, having twenty-five windowes on ech side of it §.” Such a magnificent room was this for books! nor was it, we may be sure, a body without a soul. We even know it was not. “When some years ago I was at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire,” cries Leland in his other work, so often quoted here, so little known in general, yet so replete with intelligence of men and things that have been long forgotten, “I turned to Wells, in order to clear up a point of deep antiquity: I therefore entered the library, which had been formerly furnished with no small

“ille videlicet in Hebraëâ linguâ feliciter inchoasset, hic feliciter absolveret,—elegantè concinnato Dictionario Hebraico, opere tum climato tum docto, quod annis abhinc paucis Roberti Wachefeldi polypi nimîâ diligentîâ sublatum est.” There were literary thieves then as there are now. “Joannes Infantius nuper monachus Ramesegani, qui et libros Hebraicos, corruente unâ cum nobili bibliothecâ ecenobio, ab interitu conservavit. ea mihi—retulit.”

* Alcuin, in Gale, i. 730, informs us, that there were the Hebrew Scriptures in the library at York:

“Hebraicus vel quod populus bibit inbre superno.

† We even find translations out of Arabic, made by monks. “Vidi etiam opus, cui titulus Erith Alcheretmi, ex Arabico in Latinum ab eo [Ethelard of Bath] translatum, et Euclidis Geometriam ex cõlem fonte in Latium derivatam.” (De Script. Brit. 201.)

§ Itin. iii. 122; see also 121, 122, 123; and Godwin.

“ number of books, in a very magnificent manner, by the bishops and “ canons of that city; where I found immense treasures of venerable
 “ antiquity ||.” In the fire at Croyland abbey, so early as the year
 1091, “ our whole library perished,” says Ingulphus, then abbot, “ which contained more than three hundred original volumes,” manuscripts of high antiquity, I suppose, from the appellation of original, “ besides lesser,” and more modern “ volumes, which were more than “ four hundred *.” There were even no fewer than seventeen hundred manuscripts in the library at Peterborough †. But, to keep closer to the room itself, “ Richard Whittington in the yere 1420,” Stowe tells us, concerning the Franciscan or grey friers, near Newgate in London, “ founded the library, which was in length one hundred twenty and nine “ foot, and in breadth thirty-one, all seeled [ceiled] with wainscot; “ having twenty-eight desks and eight double settles of wainscot; which,
 “ in the next yeere following, was altogether finished in building, and “ within three yeeres after furnished with bookes to the charges of five “ hundred fifty-six pounds, tenne shillings ‡.” This is a pleasing view of the manner and form in which the interior of a monastic library was laid out. And, at the close, let me repeat what Leland speaks concerning one library more. “ Some years ago I was at Glastonbury,” he notes, “ —where is an abbey at once the most ancient and the most famous in “ all our island, and by the favour of Richard Whiting, abbot of the ¶ De Script. Brit. 387: “ Cùm aliquot abhinc annis essem Glessoburgi Somurotrigum, “ Fontanctum divertebam, ut aliquid penitioris antiquitatis eruerem. Intravi igitur biblio- “ thecam, quæ ab episcopis et canonicis ejusdem urbis non parvo librorum numero “ olim magnificentissimè perornata fuit, ubi immensos venerandæ antiquitatis thesauros “ inveni.”

* Ingulphus, p. 98, Oxon: “ Tota quoque bibliotheca nostra periit, quæ amplius quàm “ ccc volumina originalia continebat, præter minora volumina, quæ amplius erant quàm “ cccc.”

† Tanner, preface, xxv. from Gunton, 173.

‡ Stowe, 341: “ From an ancient manuscript delivered to me by a friend,” but previously seen by Leland, who makes large extracts from it in Coll. i. 108, 109. Leland uses the words “ ligno intestini operis,” which we should not have known how to translate with certainty, if Stowe had not explained them to mean wainscot. The very ceiling was of wainscot, with the desks and seats.

“ place,”

“ place,” who was judicially murdered afterwards by that sanguinary tyrant Henry, “ refreshed my mind after its fatigue from long and laborious studies, till some new ardour for reading and learning should inflame me. This ardour came sooner than I expected. I therefore went immediately to the library, which was not accessible to every body; that there I might very carefully turn over those remains of very sacred antiquity which are there in such numbers as are hardly to be found any where else in Britain.” [Or, as Leland speaks of them in another place, “ those vast treasures of books, the truly venerable monuments of antiquity.”] “ But scarce had I fairly entered the doorway, when even the view alone of the very ancient books threw a religious awe over my mind, or rather raised up a wild astonishment in it; and I therefore stopt short awhile. Then, after a salutation to the genius of the room, for some days I ransacked the shelves with great curiosity §.” This is the finest compliment that ever was paid to a library by a man of genius and learning; nor could either the Bodleian or the Vatican ever receive a finer, than what is thus paid to a library merely monastic.

But let us not suppose, in the readiness of prejudice to accumulate supposition upon supposition, and bury truth under the hills of its own piling; that the monks made as little use of these libraries, as many of our lay-gentlemen do of theirs at present; and that those, like these,

Unlearned men, of books assum'd the care,
As eunuchs are the guardians of the fair.

No! We see the very reverse. We have indeed an evidence just as good for their use of their libraries, as we have for our own; a number of scholars and of publications. From the scholars let us select one or two of the best, but all Saxon. Dunstan, says the historian Malmesbury, “under the tuition of these,” the monks Irish and English of Glastonbury, “took in the very marrow of Holy Scripture to an extreme “satiety. Of secular literature he thought there was somewhat to be “neglected, and somewhat also to be desired. For he listened with a “passing ear only to those writings of the poets, which dwell upon “fables, and those of the arts, which furnish the weapons of eloquence “without doing good to the soul. But arithmetic, with geometry, “astronomy, and music, which have all a mutual connexion, he learned “with satisfaction and cultivated with industry; because in these was “both a great exertion of science, an unviolated purity of truth, and a “not unprofitable consideration of the wonderful works of God. The “knowledge of these is held out in high promises by the Irish, who are “otherwise less adapted to teach the forms of the Latin language, and “the purity of speaking in it. Wherefore, being struck with a love for “all, but particularly for music, he delighted both to play himself upon his “instruments, and to hear others playing. At every interval of leisure “from his studies, he loved to take the harp, and to touch the sounding “strings into harmony. He thus, by the grace of God, had gained a “large stock of learning; as he had a vivacity of genius predominating, “to enliven an intensity of studiousness. And he had two endowments “ministering to his learning; an eloquence polished but unlaboured, “and a practice prompt but full.” One of his pupils was Ethelwold, who in early life “selected Dunstan out of all mankind, for the counsel- “lor of his life, wishing to war under his command and to lodge in his “tent, longing with him to live and with him to die. He therefore “went to Glastonbury, was there taught grammar and prosody, then “was admitted a monk.” When he became bishop of Winchester, “he did what was greatly to his honour; a scholar himself, he prized “scholars very highly; among whom Alfrie the grammarian, Wolstan “the præcentor, and Ethelgar, abbot of New Minster at Winchester, “became celebrated. But he himself, being not slightly skilled in “mathematics, left a work polished and perfect concerning the planets,

§ De Script. Brit. 41: “ Eram aliquot abhinc annis Glessoburgi Somurotrigum, ubi antiquissimum simul et famosissimum est totius insulæ nostræ cœnobium, animumque longo studiorum labore fessum, favente Richardo Whitingo ejusdem loci abbate, recreabam, donec novus quidem cùm legendi tum discendi ardor me inflammaret. Supervenit autem ardor ille citius opinione; itaque statim me contuli ad bibliothecam non omnibus perviam, ut sacrosanctæ vetustatis reliquias, quarum tantus ibi numerus quantus nullo alio facilè Britanniæ loco, diligentissimè evolverem. Vix certè limen intraveram, cùm antiquissimorum librorum vel solus conspectus religionem, nescio an stuporem, animo ineuteret meo; cæque de causâ, pedem paululum sistebam. Deinde, salutato loci numine, per dies aliquot omneis ferulos curiosissimè excussi.” Ibid. 131: “ Ingenteis librorum thesauros, veneranda planè antiquitatis monimenta.”

“ the regions and the climates of the world, as a surviving monument of “ his genius to posterity.” And Ethelwold’s life was written by “ Wol“ stan, the chanter of Winchester, his pupil and scholar, in a style “ moderately good. But Wolstan wrote another, a very useful work “ upon the harmony of tones; in which he appears a man of a good “ life, of a correct eloquence, and of much erudition*.” Such a train of stars does Dunstan, that Hesperus, lead on to illuminate the darkness of the Saxon hemisphere! We particularly find the very colour of the clerical libraries, under one department of learning, reflected in the hue of the clerical publications. Thus astronomical studies appear at once

* De Script. Brit. 162: “ ‘ Horum ergo disciplinatu (Hibernos et Anglos Glessoburgum “ frequentantes intelligit) Sacram Scripturam medullitus ad extremam satietatem exhausit.
 “ Sæcularium literarum quiddam negligendum, nonnihil etiam appetendum, putavit.
 “ Poetarum siquidem scripta duntaxat, quæ fabulas strepunt, et artes, quæ citra utilitatem “ animæ armant eloquium, transcurter audit. Arithmeticam porro cum geometriâ et astro“ nomiâ ac musicâ, quæ appendent, gratanter addidit et diligenter excoluit; et quippe “ in illis, et magna exercitatio scientiæ, et veritatis integra castitas, et mirabilium Dei non “ vana consideratio. Harum scientiam Hibernienses pro magno pollicentur, cæterum ad “ formanda Latinè verba, et ad integrè loquendum, minus idonei. Quapropter, cum “ cæterarum tum maximè musices duleddine captus, instrumenta ejus tum ipse exercere, tum “ ab aliis exerceri, dulce habere: ipse citharam, si quando a literis vacaret, sumere; ipse “ dalei strepitu resonantia fila quater.—Doctrinam multam, sicut antè dictum est, per Dei “ gratiam hauserat; quia in ejus cum strenuitate studii præecllebat vivacitas ingenii. Doc-“ trinæ horrores duæ adminiculabantur, eloquentia climata sed illaborata, dictorumque “ executio prompta et integra.” Ibid. 163: “ ‘ Solum omnium mortalium Dunstanum suæ “ vitæ consiliarium elegit; illius commilitium, illius contubernium desiderans, ei convivere, “ ei commori exæstuans. Venit igitur Glesconiam, et ibi grammaticam metricamque artem “ edoctus, postremò etiam monachus factus’.”—“ Illud eximie planè laudis erat, quòd “ literatos, literatus et ipse, maximi fecerit, inter quos et Alfricus grammaticus, Wolstanus “ præcentor, et Ethelgarus—Novi monasterii quod Ventæ Simenorum enituit, fundatore “ Alfredo Magno, abbas, clari fuerunt. Ipse verò, in mathesi non leviter eruditus, opus “ climatum et rotundum de planetis, regionibus et climatibus mundi, tanquam victurum “ ingenii monumentum, posteritati reliquit.” Ibid. 165: “ ‘ Hujus vitam Wolstanus quidem “ cantor Wintoniensis, discipulus (jus scilicet et alumnus, composuit stylo mediocri.
 “ Fecit et aliud opus de tonorum harmoniâ, eruditi Angli judicium, homo vitæ bonæ et “ eloquentiæ castigatæ’.” Malmesbury’s Life of Dunstan is one of the many pieces, biographical or historical, that still want an editor of spirit under a patronage from the public.
 The account of Wolstan is in Savile, 31, “ valde utile, eruditi Angli indicium.”

replenishing

replenishing their libraries with ancient works, and generating an addition of modern books to them; in the eighth and some succeeding centuries*. But, that we may not diffuse ourselves over too ample a space, let us fix our eyes upon a single century of this lower period, and (as in the higher) upon a single group of persons within it. The famous Roger Bacon, in a letter which he sent with some of his works

* Leland's Coll. ii. 400, from a letter of Aleuin's to Charlemagne: [Quoad] "chartulas — calculationis cursûs lunaris, vel bisextilis rationis, quas nostræ devotioni tradidistis explorandas; invenimus—in eis rationes diligentissimè exquisitas, acutissimè inventas, nobilissimè prolatas.—Direxi excellentiæ vestræ stamen quarundam supputationum, de solis lunæque per signiferum cursu—:

"Vivere me terris vix vix sinit improba febris,

"Descripsi paucis partes et sydera cœli."

Gale, i. 728. Aleuin says thus concerning the archbishop of York, when he was master of the school there:

"Ast alios fecit præfatus nosse magister

"Harmoniam cœli, solis lunæque labores,

"Quinque poli zonas, errantia sidera septem,

"Astrorum leges, ortus, simul atque recessus."

Leland's Coll. iv. 17: "Tractatus Jo. Pecham de sphærâ. Theorica Lincoln. de latitudinibus planetarum. Tractatus ejusdem de sphærâ. Alfraganus de motibus cœlestium corporum." 19: "Alkindius de judiciis astrorum. Tabulæ magistri Simonis Bredon de rebus astronomicis.—Alkindus de radiis.—Commentum Simonis Bredon super aliquas demonstrationes Almagesti Ptolemæi." 20: "Introductorium Alcabitii cum commento Joannis de Saxo.—Gebur in speculativâ astronomiâ.—Tabula latitudinis quinque planetarum, autore Simone Bredon.—Theorica planetarum in fronte adscriptus Herfordensi, in fine Lincolniensi alias Grotest. Sequitur ibidem et alia Theorica; forsân illa [hæc] Lincolniensem agnoscit autorem.—Odyngton de motibus planetarum, et ALMANACK revisionis eorum; quidam annotavit in margine, 'Fuit monachus, ut putatur, de Evesham,' Lelandus, Est autem libellulus velut theorica ALMANACK Profacii Judæi. Tabula motûs octavæ sphæræ, autore Profacio Judæo. Tabula æquationis domorum, cum canone præcedente, per magis. Joannem Wate." 22: "Tabulæ æquationum planetarum, autore Simone Bredon. Astronomia calculatoria. Astronomia judiciaria. Perspectiva Alacen." 23: "Commentarii et arculi rerum astronomicarum ad miraculum doctè picti," which præferebant Brightferti, monachi Ramesiensis, nomen," &c. &c. &c. One monk, even a poetical one, yet a severe student, in the reign of Richard I. attempted much to square the circle; "nullum non movens lapidem, quo tandem, si id fieri quidem posset, circulum abolveret." (De Script. Brit. 227.) See also Johnson's Canons, A. D. 957, for Almanack again.

to pope Clement, says he sent them by “ a young man, whom I have “ caused to be instructed in five or six languages, and in the mathematics,
 “ and in perspectives, in which lies the whole difficulty of the papers “ that I send ; as ‘undoubtedly there is no one among the Latin scholars, “ who in all that I write can answer so many points as he, because of “ the method which I observe, and because I have instructed him, “ though he is only twenty, or at most twenty-one years of age. There “ was not one at Paris, who knew more of the foundations of philoso“ phy, though he has not yet produced flowers and fruits because of his “ youth. He has brought with him a crystal sphere to shew some experi- “ ments, and I have instructed him in the demonstration and figuration
 “ of the secret point ; nor is there one in Italy, nor are there two at Paris, “ who can assign a competent reason in this matter.” But “ in the two “ years, during which I have been particularly engaged in the study of “ wisdom, neglecting all vulgar attentions to money, I have expended “ more than TWO THOUSAND POUNDS in books of secrets, in a variety of “ experiments, and in languages, and instruments, and tables, and other “ means of obtaining the friendship of the wise, and of instructing the “ minds of my hearers*.” So expensively was a Roger Bacon reared, into all his eminence of learning ! So high-set was the soul of this monk, in its aspirations after knowledge ! And to such heights did it actually soar, by throwing off that clog to all literary enterprise at present, the love of money ! But, as Roger informs us additionally concerning his cotemporaries, “ of Christians the most famous for

* Leland's Coll. iii. 334: “ Unum adolescentem—quinque aut sex instrui feci in linguis, “ et mathematicis, et perspectivis in quibus est tota difficultas earum [eorum] quæ mitto ;
 “ nam proculdubio nullus est inter Latinos, qui in omnibus quæ scribo possit ad tot “ respondere, propter modum quem teneo, et quia cum instruxi, quamvis viginti annorum “ aut 21 ad plus. Non remansit unus Parisiis, qui plus novit de philosophiæ radicibus, “ quamvis flores et fructus nondum produxerit propter juvenilem ætatem—. Portavit cry“ stallum sphericum ad experiendum, et instruxi cum in demonstratione etfiguratione rei “ occultæ ; nec est aliquis in totâ Italia, aut Parisius duo, qui possunt dare causam satli“ cientem in hæc parte.” Ibid. 333: “ Nam per duos annos, quibus specialiter laboravi “ in studio sapientiæ, neglecto cæusu vulgi, plus quàm duo millia librarum ego posui in “ his propter libros secretos, experientias varias, et linguas, et instrumenta, et tabulas, et
 “ alia tum ad querendum amicitias sapientum tum propter instruendos auditores.”

“wisdom,” of Christians as opposed to Saracens, “one is friar Albert, “of the order of preachers, another is William de Shirwoode, treasurer “of the church of Lincoln in England,” a notice that implies the former to be no Englishman, “a man far wiser than Albert.—For there “are but two perfect, namely, Mr. John London and Mr. Peter de “Macharii Curiâ in Picardy.” London was the young man whom Bacon sent with his letter to the pope, and of whom he wrote so highly to him; “though he came a youth of fifteen to me,” says Bacon, “and poor, as having no livelihood †.”—“No one,” as Bacon subjoins, “knew the sciences, except lord Robert bishop of Lincoln; because “from the length of his life and experience, from his studiousness and “his diligence, he knew mathematics as well as perspectives, and could “know any thing; together with this, that he knew so much of lan- “guages, as to be able to understand the saints, the philosophers, or “the wise men of antiquity. Yet he knew not languages well enough “to translate, except about the close of life; when he invited Greeks “into this country, and caused books of Greek grammar to be collected in “Greece and other regions *.” Or, as Bacon enlarges his catalogue of learned English in another work, plainly posterior, “some of the wise “men of ancient times we have seen in our own days, as lord Robert “formerly bishop of Lincoln, lord Thomas bishop of St. David’s in “Wales, and friar Adam de Marisco, and Mr. Robert de Marisco, and “Mr. Lu , Mr. John London above mentioned, “and William de “Shirwoode, and others ‡.” Such a train of stars appeared equally led by

† Coll. iii. 333: “Sapientes famosiores Christianos, quorum unus est frater Albertus “de ordine prædicatorum, alius est Wilhelmus de Shirwoode, thesaurarius Lincoln. ecclesiæ “in Angliâ, longè sapientior Alberto.—Non sunt enim nisi duo perfecti, scilicet, Mr. “Joannes London, et Mr. Petrus de Macharii Curiâ Picardus.” Ibid. 334: “Juvenis 15 “annorum venit ad me, et pauper, non habens unde viveret.”

* Leland’s Coll. iii. 334: “Nullus scientias [scivit], nisi dominus Robertus, episcopus “Lincoln: per longitudinem vitæ et experientiæ, et studiositatem, et diligentiam, quia “scivit mathematicam et perspectivam, et potuit omnia scire; simul cum hõc, quòd tan- “tum scivit de linguis, quòd potuit intelligere sanctos et philosophos et sapientes antiquos. “Sed non bene scivit linguas ut transferret, nisi circa ultimum vitæ suæ; quando vocavit “Græcos, et fecit libros grammaticæ Græcæ, de Græciâ et aliis [regionibus] congregari.”

‡ Coll. iii. 335: “Antiquorum sapientum—aliquos vidimus nostri temporis, scilicet “D. Robertum

by Roger Bacon as by Dunstan before! But to both these constellations let me add a single star that is little known, yet by its light displays the wonderful keenness of a monk for mathematical learning. “Daniel, denominated Morley from his native village,” says Leland, “in his youth attended the schools of Oxford very studiously; in his maturer years went to Paris; and at last, inflamed with an unusual thirst for mathematics, turned his thoughts to the Arabs, the first for erudition in that age, whose discipline was then flourishing greatly in Spain, at their very ample city of Toledo. Going therefore to Toledo, he ransacked the shelves of the Arabs, and at last found what he had so solicitously sought. Hence feeling a desire for revisiting his country, in his return he meets with John of Oxford, bishop of Norwich” from 1175 to 1200, “by whom he was received with great liberality, as John himself was studious of mathematical knowledge. In convenient time, therefore, Daniel published two books, one upon the inferior part of the world, the other upon the superior, and dedicated them to the bishop ||.” Such an amazing range of light did the cometary mind of this monk take, to return with augmented lustre and regain its goal!

The superior, and even the common monks, came at last to have their private or personal libraries; a fact that is the consummation of evidence in favour of their fondness for literature. A point, indeed, so minute

“D. Robertum quondam episcopum Lincoln. D. Thomam episcopum S. David in Walliâ, et fratrem Adam de Marisco, et magistrum Robertum de Marisco, et Mr. Lu. et Gul. de Shirwoode, et alios.”

|| De Script. Brit. 244: “Daniel, Morilegus a natali villâ dictus, Isiacas juvenis scholas studiosissimè excoluit; maturior annis factus, Lutetiam Parisiorum inivit. Postremò mathematicæ artis cupiditate insolite tactus, animum ad Arabes, cû ætate imprimis eruditos adjecit: quorum et disciplina tunc latè in Hispaniâ, quâ stat Toletum civitas amplissima, floruit. Profectus igitur Toletum, Arabum scennia excussit, et quod quærerat maximè, tandem invenit. Hinc enata repetendi patriam cura: cui dum subservit, inter redeundum fit obvium Joannem Oxoniensi, episcopo Nordovicano; a quo liberalissimè acceptus est, studebat enim et ipse rei mathematicæ. Unde, nactâ temporis opportunitate, duos libellos, unum de inferiori, alterum de superiori parte mundi, edidit, ac Joanni Nordovicano consecravit.”

in the domestic economy of a monastery, we cannot expect to see exhibited often in the "crystal sphere" of history; but it is exhibited, and that is sufficient: we see it first in a form very humble, yet at a period very early, and with the person of a common though very dignified monk. Bede, that prince of historians concerning our isle, and that first of religious men born within it*, appears to have had his study in a building erected for the purpose, detached from the monastery, and therefore furnished with his own collection of books. It is a singular incident in the history of this saint and historian combined, that not the rude barbarity of the Danes, not the headlong violence of the Normans, though both were exerted about his monastery, had destroyed his study: it remained entire to the very days of Leland, a building low in its pitch, small in its size, and vaulted in its roof. In this state it was his oratory, as well as his study; being remembered peculiarly as his oratory by the tradition of Leland's days; and having even then what served to give the religious part of the tradition a predominance over the literary, "an altar within it, but neglected, yet bearing in the middle of its front "a piece of serpentine marble," a marble of a dusky green in the ground, and of a lively green in the spots, "inlaid into the substance of it†." This, therefore, was the altar at which Bede, equally devout and learned, happily sensible amidst all his learning that he derived his intellect and the illumination of it from the awful "Father of lights," kneeled down every morning and evening to him. Nor had he this altar, as we are naturally induced by the circumstances to suppose at first, merely because he lived out of the abbey, and was therefore precluded from the public prayers of the chapel; he carefully attended the public, we may be sure from this very attention to private. But he had an altar for his private devotions in addition to the chapel for his public; and a similar incident in the biography of a similar saint, shews this evidently to be the reason for both. Adhelm, the founder, as well as abbot of Malmesbury, had equally an altar for himself, and equally left it a relic to posterity; the abbey shewing equally to the eyes of Leland himself Adhelm's "altar, a very small one, made" wholly "of" that "serpentine marble," which was only inlaid in a small piece into the other, "but bound about" "with a belt of silver, on which appeared an inscription in Latin‡:" but the same room was also that in which he slept, and in which he died. During his last moments he is described by the narrator of them, a person actually attending upon him at the time, as desiring to be lifted out of bed, and to be rested sitting upon the floor at the opposite side of the room; that, as he expressed himself, "on the holy spot at which I" "have been used to pray I may now invoke my Father." Thither he was carried accordingly, and rested upon a rug; from thence he invoked, and there he died invoking*. Such was the happy, the glorious conclusion of life to this first of scholars! "Let me die the death of the" "righteous, and may my last end be like his!"

* See iv. 2, a note at the end.

† De Script. Brit. 118: "Illud certè propius ad miraculum accedit, quòd nec Dacorum violentia, nec ferocia Gulielmi Magni Nortmanni, ita Girovicensis cœnobii, quod vulgò nunc Jarwe vocatur, ædificia omnia concusserit; quin adhuc Bedæ oratorium extet, humile quidem opus, et cameratum, utcunque tamen integrum; in quo et hodie altare est, sed neglectum, et in altaris medio crusta ophiutici marmoris. Hæc nos in gratiam lectoris antiquitatis studiosi." It is also called "casula" and "mansiuicula" hereafter.

The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileg'd beyond the common walk
Of virtuous life, quite in the verge of heaven.

Yet this chamber has been destroyed since the days of Leland, and what had been spared for its sanctity (I suppose) by Normans, by Danes, has fallen under the hands of ignorant reformers. Camden notes it not,

‡ De Script. Brit. 100: "Altare, sed minutum, ex ophiutico marmore, argento revinctum, in quo Latina inscriptio apparet. Hæc," this and other relics, "ego nuper Meilduni vidi."

* Leland's Coll. iv. 79: "'Multum me delectat sedere ex adverso, sancto meo loco in quo orare solebam; ut et ego sedens Patrem meum invocare possim.' Et sic in pavimento suæ casulæ decantans—spiritum—suum e corpore exhalavit." The passage is also in Simeon Dunelmensis, i. 15, Twissen, and in Smith's Bede, with this useful addition from Malmesbury, that Bede was rested sitting on the floor by the altar, "cilicio subjecto decumbens, illibato sensu et hilari vultu." (P. 803.) So a bishop of Durham, "uno ferme antequam moreretur mense, se in ecclesiam jussit transportari; ubi residens contra altare, ex profundo cordis erumpens in gemitum," &c. (Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 700.)

no traveller, no biographer has noted it since; but Simeon, the historical monk of Durham, had noticed it before, and (what is very remarkable) noticed it only as his study. "Even the place," he cries, without seeming to know what we know from Leland, "is shewn at this day, where he had his little mansion of stone, and, free from all disturbance, was accustomed to sit, to meditate, to read, to dictate, and to write†." The very chair, too, in which he used to sit for that purpose within this room, "a rude oaken chair called Bede's," is preserved to this moment, though the room itself is gone; being "carefully locked up" in "the vestry" of the old monastic chapel, converted into a parish-church, but very recently rebuilt‡. And this was the very object, as I remark with satisfaction, that first served like a soliciting wire to call forth the electrical sparks of antiquarianism, then lying latent in my soul, even to call them forth with a liveliness so bright, or with an explosion so loud, as to be recollected with great vivacity by me on this occasion. The chair being mentioned in a provincial newspaper of 1745, as seized for a popish relic, and for a popish relic intended to be burned by a mob of protestant fools; even then, at ten years of age, my mind fastened upon the fact, and my memory retraces it now in the impressions made then. Such was the study of a Bede, once furnished with a variety of books, and so enabling him, with an occasional reference to the library of the abbey, to follow his variety of pursuits in literature! This, however, was a bedchamber, an oratory, and a study in one. The next step in improvement would be to appropriate a room entirely for a study; even while the less rich or the less refined continued to study in the open cloysters, had some of the windows to them occasionally glazed for their convenience in studying, and even had books appropriated to the cloysters, with desks fastened on the walls for their studying there§. But

Bede's

† Simeon, i. 14: "Ostenditur etiam locus hodie, ubi de lapide mansiunculam habens, ab omni iniquitudine liber, sedere, meditari, legere, dictare consueverat, et scribere."

‡ Gough, iii. 124, from Grose.

§ Ducarrel, 29, for "old stone desks," at the cloysters of St. Audoen in Rouen, and for the

Bede's model of a study was not much altered for ages afterward, even with bishops themselves. Richard Bury, who became bishop of Durham in 1333, who was so dignified in mind as against all advice to refrain from all solicitations for this or for any bishopric, who was likewise so prodigal of spirit as always to wait upon the pope, or even the cardinals at Rome, "with twenty clerks of his own, in garments of one suit, and with thirty-six esquires in another suit;" yet "was so highly delighted with a multitude of books, as by common report to have more than all the other prelates put together, keeping many in separate repositories at his different manors, but at the place of his temporary residence leaving so many on the floor of his bedchamber, as hardly allowed the enterer to stand or walk without trampling upon a book ||." It was altered, however, soon after that period. "Out of this hall," notes Battely in his description of the priory at Christchurch in Canterbury before 1411, "there was by some stone-steps a passage into a stone-chamber," like Bede's, "called Le Paved Chamber," being floored (as Bede's assuredly was) with a "payement;" and "the prior's BEDCHAMBER-STUDY, and some other rooms for his private apartment, seem to have been contiguous to the paved chamber;" or, as the words of Battely's original, the Obituary, more pointedly as well as more accurately announce, "a room of stone, which is called Le Pavid Chamber, with two other chambers," not so paved, as leaving the name of Le Pavid Chamber to that, "and the prior's bed in his dormitory, with the study and other rooms an-

the "Benedictines" having "anciently a custom" to study in the cloysters "at stated times in the day." Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 141: "Juvenis, habitum monasticum suscipiens, crepit virtutum moribus florescere, et per studium claustralis residentie fluente scripturarum sicbundo corde haurire;" 146, "australem—partem claustrum ad usum studiosorum confiatrum vitream fecit," 640, "ad inspectionem claustralium librorum," &c.

|| Wharton, i. 765: "Summe delectabatur in multitudine librorum, plures enim libros habuit (ut passim dicebatur) quam omnes pontifices Angliæ; et præter eos quos habuit in diversis maneriis suis repositos separatim, ubicunque cum suâ familia residebat tot libri jacebant in camerâ qua dormivit, quod ingredientibus vix stare poterant vel incedere nisi librum aliquem pedibus conculcarent." 766, "Venit ipse cum xv clericis suis in vestibus unius sectæ, et xxxvi armigeris alterius sectæ.—Respondit se nec pro illo episcopatu, nec pro aliquo alio, literas missarum."

"nexed,"

"nered," all equally not paved *. In this form, so plainly an improvement just above Bede's, did all the priors in the kingdom, we may be sure, possess each of them a study: but it soon improved at Canterbury, and probably at other places. "In the" same "Obituary we read," cries Battely again concerning the same priory, but still without seeming to know the curiousness of his own notices, "that," between 1472 and 1494, "—prior Selling built from the ground—a stone tower, which "was covered with lead, and which had fair glass-windows; and that "he decently adorned it in the inside; and that this was called THE PRIOR'S STUDY.—There the prior had his UPPER STUDY, and his LOWER STUDY, which had shelves and cases for books and writings, and "wherein several records relating to the priory, even a vast number of "them, were stored up †." A prior of Ely, just a little before, is equally said to have "built a new chamber,—where he sometimes held "spiritual discourses with his brethren upon the rights of the church, "the profits and the concerns of the church; he had there his STUDY "also, for inspecting his books at his leisure ‡." The example thus set by the priors and monks, we find followed at last by the very laity themselves; though the laity were for ages so ignorant in comparison with the clergy, that to be a clerk implied a man to be a scholar, and to be a layman imported him to be illiterate. Thus even a bishop of Durham, who died in 1333, is reported by his historian to have been "chaste, "but laical, as he understood not the Latin language, and with difficulty "could pronounce it §." Yet we have two studies among the laity, striking

* Battely, 92: "Juxta aulam, prioris ædem lapideam quæ vocatur Le Pavid Chamber, cum duabus aliis cameris, lectumque prioris in dormitorio, cum studio et aliis domibus 'annexis'."

† Battely, 93, 94.

‡ Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 649: "Fecit—fieri unam novam cameram—, ubi quandoque cum fratribus suis spirituales habuit tractatus, jura ecclesiæ et utilitates ac negotia ecclesiæ necessaria concernentes; habuit etiam ibidem studium suum pro libris cum sibi vacaverat inspicendis." Even Newcome notices his abbot's study, p. 211.

§ Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 761: "Castus erat, sed laicus, Latinum non intelligens, sed cum difficultate pronuncians." Of this "difficulty" we have two instances; one is this, "Cum in consecratione sua profiteri debuit, quamvis per multos dies antè instructorem "habuisset, striking in their nature, and early in their date; we see a noble among them about the same period with both these priors, having such a propensity for reading as to form for himself a study, like one of the priors above, in a tower, even in one of the towers of his castle; taking such a delight in his study as to call it PARADISE, and disposing it in a manner so very ingenious, as is worthy of the taste of the present day. "The castle of Wreschill," says Leland under Yorkshire, "is al of very fair and greate squarid stone, both withyn and withowte, wherof (as sum hold opinion) much was brought owt of Fraunce. In the castelle be only 5 towers, one at ech corner, almost of like biggenes. The gatchouse is the 5, having 5 longginges [or stories] yn high [highth]; 3 of the other towers have 4 highes [heights] in longginges; the 4 containith the botery, pantery, pastery, lardery, and kechyn. The haule and the great chaumbers be fair, and so is the chapel, and the closettes," for my lord's family in the chapel. "To conclude, the house is one of the most propre beyound Trente, and semith as newly made: yet was it made by a youngger brother of the Percys, erle of Wiccester," by Thomas Percy earl of Worcester, "that was yn high favor with Richard the Secunde, and bought the maner of Wresehil—. One thing I likid exceedingly yn one of the towers, that was a study caullid Paradise, wher was a closet in the midle of 8 squares latisid aboute, and at the top of every square was a desk ledgid," that is, with a ledging to it, "to set bookes on cofers withyn them; and these semid as yoinid hard to the toppe of the closet, and yet, by pulling, one or all wold cum doune briste higthe in rabettes, and serve for desks to lay bokes on*." This description is singularly curious in itself, either as it lays open to our eyes all the interiors of a nobleman's

"habuisset, legere nescivit; et cum, auriculantibus aliis," or prompted by others, "cum difficultate ad illud verbum metropolitice pervenisset, et diu anhelans pronunciare non posset, dixit in Gallico," as being a Frenchman, "seit par dite. Stupebant omnes circumstantes, dolentes talem in episcopum consecrandum." This is a curious proof of the laical state of his education. Another occurs immediately thus: "Cum similiter celebraret ordines, nec illud verbum in cenigmate proferre posset; dixit circumstantibus, par Srynt Lowys il ne fu pas curteis, qui ceste parole ici escrit."

* Itin. i. 55.

castle, or as it delineates to our mind the study of a nobleman, literary, refined, and magnificent †. The whole island at present cannot furnish one private library, I believe, more artfully contrived in parts, or more elegantly disposed in the whole, than this “study,” with a “closet” or enclosed space “in the middle” of the room, with “8 squares, latisid “about” at the sides of the room; and with “a desk ledgid,” seemingly “yoinid hard to the toppe of the closet,” actually standing one “at the top of every square,” yet coming down “in rabettes” on being pulled, resting at the “briste higthe” of a man, and there “serving for “deskes to lay” those “bokes on,” which were “on cofers withyn” the squares. Nor was this the only paradise of the kind within the kingdom; there was another at “Lekingfeld,” near York, once belonging probably to the very same earl, as it certainly belonged afterwards to his nearest relations the earls of Northumberland ‡. There Leland equally notices “A LITTLE STUDIYNG CHAUMBER—, caullid Paradice,” and in it “the genealogie of the Percys §.” So very literary was the house of Percy in general, or so very literary was this younger son of it in particular! If, however, such a taste for letters, such a love of a library, appears in a laical, noble, and a military family, we may be sure they predominated among the clergy, and the briskness of the current proclaims the vivacity of the fountain.

To this evidence, so powerful in its nature, so comprehensive in its reach, it is almost impossible to make any additions; I shall therefore attempt only to give the whole a roundness and a finishing, by subjoining a few notices, miscellaneous, new, and curious, yet all concurring to shew a spirit of literary refinement predominant in the monasteries. In the very list of articles carried off by the royal housebreaker from † Leland's Itin. i. 55: “The garde robe in the castelle was exceedingly fair, and so wer “the gardeins withyn the mote, and the orchardes withoute; and yn the orchardes were “mountes opere topiario, writhen about with degrees like turninges of cocki'shilles, to cum “to the top without payn.” These I suppose to have been the first in the kingdom, and from Leland's manner believe them to be very rare even in his days.

‡ Camden, 577.

§ Leland's Itin. i. 48.

convents and cathedrals in the west, we find “a great piece of an uni- “ corne-horne, as it is supposed ¶.” This appears to have been considered as very valuable, because it was an object of plunder for a monarch. All the literary and curious spirit of Henry was drowned in a deluge of sacrilegious avarice. But in the inventory of plunder procured at Winchester, I observe two similar articles that again unite with notices ancient or modern to mark the actual existence of an animal which is reputed a mere nonentity now: “Item,” for these thieves, acting under the authority of law, carried on their larcenies, petty and grand, in the regular form of mercantile transactions, keeping their ledgers, and entering their “items” in them, “one pastoral staff of an “ unicorn’s horn—, item, one rector’s staff of unicorn’s horn ¶.” To these

¶ Stephens’s Additions to Monasticon, i. 84.

¶ Hist. of Winchester, i. 26. That an animal, which is so frequently noticed in itself by the ancients, and, in its horn at least, so familiarly known to the moderns as late as the Reformation, should now be universally considered to have been fabulous from the first, is one of the most extraordinary incidents in the world of letters. Mentioned by Job (xxxix.
 9, 10), by Moses (Numbers, xxiii. 22, Deut. xxxiii. 17), by David (Psalm xxii. 21, xxix. 6, xcii. 10), and by Isaiah (xxxiv. 7), as an animal actually existent, and sufficiently known for a transient reference; even characterized by three of them as fierce, strong, and dangerous; even described in its appearance by Pliny with a minuteness reflected plainly from a real view; it has yet, in the opinion of all, vanished like a vision from the face of nature.
 The fact is assuredly, that it still lives unseen by Europeans in the woods or wilds of its native India; that from them it was formerly made known to the ancients by the singularity of its horn, with an accompanying account of its predominating qualities; and that it was equally made known to the moderns in the same manner. “Orsei Indi,” says the only describer of it, Pliny, viii. 21, “—venantur—asperimam—feram monocerotem, reliquo cor“ pore equo similem, capite cervo, pedibus elephanto, caudâ apro, mugitu gravi, uno cornu “ nigro mediâ fronte cubitorum duâ eminente. Hanc feram vivam negant capi.” This appears from the black horn, the stag’s head, and the general similitude to a horse, to have been the very original from which all our delineations of the unicorn have been derived, and the arms of our sovereigns are to this day decorated by the pencil of Pliny. Yet how could such a horn as Pliny’s be formed into a “staff?” Could it only in the manner by which a sapphire-stone is in iii. 2, before, by constituting the cross part of one above? No! In Germany we find a kind of grotto-chapel, in which are an altar, a crucifix, and two candlesticks, “all three made out of the horn of an unicorn.” (Keyser, i. 86.) This proves at once what Pliny’s description and our own delineations tell us, the great length of the horn.
 Pliny’s, indeed, as two cubits in length generally, and perhaps more than two occasionally.

these the catalogue of booty from the west adds, "the same day, of "the said stuffe, a peece of mother of perle, like a shell—; the same "day, of the same stuffe, eight braunches of faire currall *." These must have been much more rare and precious then than they are at present, I apprehend; to be repositied as curiosities in the museums of the clergy, and to be seized as merchandise highly profitable by the king. But I see another that makes no "item" in the list of articles stolen, because it would produce nothing upon the merchant's counter, yet which may really excite the wonder, and challenge the imitation of the present age. In the church of Canterbury was exhibited, down to the Reformation, as Leland tells us, "a globe of crystal, hollow within, and "containing an apple in the hollow, among the offerings made to Thomas "a Becket. And when I asked the exhibitor of the curiosities in the "church, what was the meaning of the miraculous object, he replied, "that it was an oblation formerly made to the martyr by John Man- "deville," the famous traveller, who was born at St. Alban's, went abroad in 1322, staid abroad thirty-four years, and afterwards published an account of his travels. "Whose donation soever it was, it is "a wonderful thing to behold an apple preserved from rotting through "so many years: the total exclusion of the air is possibly the cause of it †." In the same church, too, but in the quire of it, where the stalls of the would easily furnish materials for an altar from its very thick part at the base, for a crucifix from its middle parts, and for a couple of candlesticks from its upper; but would more easily serve as a staff, rising about a yard in height. The unicorn then, though as little known in person to Europe now, as is the chaus, or the cephus, the latter of which was exhibited once, but the former frequently, at Rome, before the days of Pliny (viii. 19), yet infinitely better known in all ages of European history by the singleness of its horn, is not that rhinoceros with which it has been generally confounded from a mere amazement at its disappearance, but from which it is actually discriminated by the pen of Pliny (viii. 19); lying hid merely in the woods of India, as the cephus equally lies in the wilds of Ethiopia, and ready to come forth one day perhaps with the cephus, for the amazement of a disbelieving Europe.

* Steevens, i. 85.

† Leland De Script. Brit. 368: "Quòd Duroverni—crystallinum orbem, sed concavum, "cum malo intus recondito, inter munera Thomæ Becketo consecrata, repererim. Cùm- "que a mystagogo rogâsem, quid miraculi esset; respondebat, oblatum illud olim munus- "culum martyri a Joanne Mandevillâ. Cujus ejus erat munus, mira res videre malum "per tot annos a carie salvum. Fieri potest, ut spiritus omnino exclusus in causâ sit."

monks

monks remained to the year 1704, and where the lead of the roof appeared to have melted so much in the fire of 1174, as to have run into the joints of the pavement, and to have been discovered there on altering a part of the pavement about 1706; the pavement immediately adjoining to the altar-rail is laid even at present, “with large slabs of a—stone,—which—has so much the appearance of the grain of wood, as to be taken by some for a petrification; but—many stones of this kind were taken up” not long ago, “—and many of them were capable of a polish little inferior to that of agate. The edges [run] in curious strata, and the tops of many are beautifully clouded. The connoisseurs have called them by different names; some, antique alabaster agate; others, the Sicilian; others, the Egyptian agate; and the traveller Dr. Pocock, late bishop of Meath, diaspro fiorito, or the “flowered jasper‡.” The very variation of opinions concerning the quality of the stone proves the extraordinary singularity of it; but in the library at Croyland, so early as 1091, we see a celestial globe actually fabricated of metal, and incidentally mentioned in such magnificent terms as arrest our admiration very powerfully. “We then lost,” says Ingulphus, from a familiar knowledge of the globe before a fire consumed the library, “a very fine and very costly pinnax, wonderfully formed of every kind of metal, according to the variety of signs or stars; for Saturn was of copper, Jupiter of gold, Mars of iron, Sol of brass, Mercury of electrum,” a mixed metal, of four fifths gold and one fifth silver, “Venus of tin, but Luna of silver. The colures, with all the signs of the zodiac, received from the dexterity of the man who made it, their images and their colours in various forms or figures, according to their natures; and, by their multiplicity of gems or metals, inconceivably attracted the eyes, as well as gratified the minds of all spectators: there was not such a nadir known or noticed in all England. The king of France had formerly given it to Turketyl, but he at his death had bequeathed it to the common library, as at once ornamental to the room, and useful for lectures to the younger monks: yet it was now melted, consumed, and destroyed by the

‡ Gostling, 302, 301, 299, 246.

“devouring fire §.” The abbies thus became the repositories of the finest productions of nature and of art. But let me rather mention what comes more immediately to their character for learning, that the monks were artists themselves, the planners, the executors of many ingenious works; their own carvers, their own clock-makers, their own architects. I have formerly observed, upon the express evidence of history, that Dunstan, the monk of Canterbury, was “dexterous in every manual operation,—could form pictures or inscriptions, imprint them “with a graver upon gold, silver, brass, or iron, and indeed execute “any thing ||.” So likewise, in 1070, we find an abbot of Abingdon “a wonderful artist in fabrications of silver and gold ¶.” Mann too, abbot of Evesham in the reign of the Confessor, and reported to have died in the same night, at the same hour with the Confessor himself, “had been introduced into most of the sacred and liberal arts, excelling “in the knowledge of singing, of writing, of painting, and *working up “articles in gold .” And Cuthbert, who succeeded Walstod as prelate of Hereford in 742, “finished with his own hand many ornaments of “the church which Walstod had left unfinished with his at death; and “among these was a bannere cross,—composed of silver, gold, or “jewels †.” We find also “compendious tables for the instrument “called § Ingulphus, 98: “Pulcherrimum—pinacem tunc perdidimus, et valde sumptuosum, de “omni genere metalli pro varietate siderum et signorum mirabiliter fabrefactum. Saturnus “enim cupreus, Jupiter autem aureus, Mars verò ferrugineus, Sol de auricalco, Mercurius “electrinus, Venus de stanno, et Luna fuit de argento. Coluri, et omnia signa zodiaci, “juxta suas naturas, suas imagines et colores variis formis et figuris arte fabrilis sortientes, “multiplicitate tam gemmarum quàm metallorum, et tam oculos quàm ingenia spectantium supra modum sollicitabant. Non erat tale nader in totâ Angliâ notum aut nominatum. Rex Franciæ quondam Turketulo dederat; at ille in suo obitu communi bibliothecæ, tam pro ornamento quàm pro juniorum documento, commendârat. Jam igne vorace consumptum [fuit], et in nihilum liquefactum.”

|| See ii. 3, before.

¶ Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 167: “In auri argentique fabricio operator mirificus.”

* Monasticon, i. 151: “Sacris liberisque plurimis artibus fuerat imbutus, videlicet cantoris, scriptoris, pictoris, auri que fabrilis operis, scientiâ pollens.”

† Leland De Script. Brit. 134: “Ornamenta verò ecclesiæ multa, quæ moriens Valstodus “imperfecta reliquit, ipse perfecit; inter quæ vexillum crucis erat, ut his testatur carminibus, “ called albion,” by which is meant (says Leland) the clock at St. Alban’s; and “ a tract by Richard Walingford, concerning the composition and conclusions of the instrument *albion.” Wallingford was the very maker of the clock, after he had become the abbot of the monastery. Then, as Leland himself informs us, from an inspection of his clock and a perusal of his tract, “ willing to give a miraculous proof “ of his genius, of his learning, and of his manual operations, with great “ labour, greater expense, and very great art, he formed such a fabric “ of a clock, that all Europe in my opinion cannot shew one even second “ to it; whether you note the course of the sun and moon, or the fixed “ stars, and whether you consider again the increase or decrease of the “ sea, or the lines with the figures and demonstrations almost infinitely “ diversified. And when he had completed a work truly worthy of “ immortality, he wrote and published in a book, as he was the very “ first of all the mathematicians of his time, a set of canons, lest so fine “ a piece of mechanism should be lowered in the erroneous opinion of “ the monks, or should be stopped in its movements from their ignorance in the order of its structure†.”

But

“ nibus, quæ ego non modò in quarto libro Gulielmi Meildunensis de pontificibus Anglo-“ rum offendi,” see them in Savile, 162, “ verùm cùm nuper Meildunum inviserem,—in “ vetustissimo libro sacrorum epigrammatôn reperi.

“ Hæc veneranda crucis Christi vexilla sacratæ “ Cooperat antistes venerandus nomine Walstod, “ Argenti atque auri fabricare monilibus amplis,” &c.

* Leland’s Coll. iv. 20: “ ‘ Tabulæ compendiosæ pro instrumento albion’.” Leland: “ Intelligit horologium Sancti Albani. ‘ Tractatus Richardi Walingford de compositione et “ conclusionibus instrumenti albion’.”

† Leland De Script. Brit. 404, 405: “ Cùm jam per amplas liæbat fortunas, voluit “ illustri aliquo opere non modò ingenii, verum etiam eruditionis ac artis excellentis, mira“ culum ostendere. Ergo talem horologii fabricam magno labore, majore sumptu, arte “ verò maximâ, compegit, qualem non habet tota (meâ opinione) Europa secundum; sive “ quis cursum solis ac lunæ, seu fixa sidera, notet, sive iterum maris incrementa et decre-“ menta, seu lineas unâ cum figuris ac demonstrationibus ad infinitum pœnè variis, consi-“ deret. Cùmque opus æternitate dignissimum ad umbilicam perduxisset, canones (ut “ erat in mathesi omnium sui temporis facilè primus) edito in hoc libro scripsit; ne tam “ insignis machina errore monachorum vilesceret, aut incognito structuræ ordine sileret.”

Yet

But I hasten to close all my account, with one fact worthy to be the close of all. Alan de Walsingham, monk of Ely in 1322, formed the

Yet Mr. Newcome, p. 230, speaks thus concerning the clock: "As a specimen of his ingenuity, he is said to have invented," not, as the fact is, invented and fabricated, "a clock that was a miracle of art; it exhibited the course of the sun and moon, the rising and setting of the fixed stars and planets, the ebbing and flowing of the sea, and, in short, the figures, operations and effects of all the heavenly bodies." As Mr. Newcome, throughout his whole work, adopts the fashionable and fallacious mode of general reference; and, as in all this part of it he writes from an historian never published yet, but lying secreted among the king's manuscripts in the British Musæum (p. 173, 174); he may have spoken here, however, beyond the bounds of Leland's accounts, yet within the lines of authority and truth. "He had begun this clock early in life," or (as Leland says), only after he became abbot, and so was rich enough to begin it. "As we have no scientific description of this piece of mechanism, handed down to us, we can form no judgment of its merits." Yet Walsingham himself wrote such a description, and this was existing in the days of Leland. The latter saw it, as he tells us himself, "in bibliothecâ Collegii de Clare," at Cambridge. (Coll. iv. 19, 20.) He had read it there, as appears from his account above, and from this farther account. Concerning the description, he says, "Joannes Stubius, mathematicus, multa refert; incidit illi in exemplar, sed mutilum, unde quod deerat in albione," the name of the description as well as of the clock, "supplevit; pars albionis instrumenti," Leland meaning still the description, "sapientia dicta, Norembergæ impressa est" (p. 405); part being printed at Nuremberg, and the whole existing in manuscript before, and in the days of Leland; Mr. Newcome should have searched the libraries for the tract, especially that at Cambridge, in which Leland saw it, to gratify his "scientific" readers, or at least to "form" his own "judgment of its merits." But it was more easy to suppose there was no "scientific description," and to found even its very existence upon report. Yet his own description is surely sufficient in itself, for every reader not "scientific," and for every one who wishes to "form" his "judgment of its merits" in general. It is even sufficient for Mr. Newcome himself, in Mr. Newcome's own opinion; he who says, "we can form no judgment of its merits," for want of a scientific description, saying afterwards, "it would appear, however, to have been a masterpiece for that age," and thus pronouncing upon its merits at once.—See also Leland's Itin. iii. 117, for another clock made by another monk at Glastonbury, and thus noticed by an inscription on the south part of the transept under the clock, "Horologium; Petrus Lightfote monachus fecit hoc opus." This I suppose to be the very clock that is still preserved in the cathedral of Wells, and is there reported to have been brought from Glastonbury. On a large horizontal plate it exhibits horsemen coursing round the plate, while the time is announced by the clock, &c. This is, as that at Glastonbury was, within the church, and, like it, near the quire. "Longitudo brachiorum juxta chorum," says Worcestre, 29, concerning Glastonbury, "a boreâ in meridiem, versus Le Orlage," only one therefore, "96 gressus."

plan,

plan; and began the execution, of that very dome with that very lantern over the cathedral of Ely, which, from the lightness yet strength of the arches supporting them; from the number yet luminousness of the windows above; and from the visionary or fairy sort of light darted down by the lantern above all, constitute a structure pre-eminently elegant, pre-eminently striking to the eye, even in the shadowy exhibition of it by the pencil, the graver, and the rolling-press*!

Thus did the lamp of learning continue to burn with considerable brightness, in those very cells of the monastery which have been falsely believed to be sepulchral only. It seems, indeed, to our sight at present, to have burned but faintly; because the sun of literature it now throwing its beams around us, and dazzling our eyes with its radiance. And the library of our conventual church at St. German's, I suppose, was in the only remaining part of the priory, the projecting point of the western wing; a part now occupied, in a kind of hereditary right, by the library of my lord.

As an appendage to the library in a monastery, was the SCRIPTORIUM, or WRITING-ROOM; that, in which copies of books were formed. Thus, as M. Paris informs us, under the abbacy of Paul, from 1077 to 1093, “a certain nobleman, stout in war, and a Norman by birth, in the time “and by the persuasion of this abbot Paul, conferred upon that church “of St. Alban’s two parts of the tithes of his demesne in the manor “of Hatfield—, and assigned them (at the suggestion of abbot Paul, a “lover of books) for the formation of volumes necessary to the church; “for that warrior was a literary man, a diligent hearer,” as not able to be himself a reader, “and lover, too, of books. To this office were “also annexed additionally [by him] some tithes in Redburn; and he “appointed a daily provision of meat to be allowed the writers,—lest “the writers should be hindered in their work. And the abbot caused “some noble volumes necessary for the church, to be there—, in the very “scriptorium, which he built himself—, written by writers selected

* Bentham, 156, 157, plate 41.

“and fetched from far†.” This passage shews us very evident that office of an abbey, from which our lawyers have derived the name of their scriptorium, and in which the books wanted were multiplied by the only printing-press of the times, the pen. But, as the passage has been strangely misunderstood by a modern writer, let me subjoin his translation to mine, in order to correct the one, and to vindicate the other. “A very stout soldier who lived at Hatfield,” says the English historian of the abbey, “—one of the Norman leaders—, gave “two tenths,” literally two parts, actually (I believe) two thirds, “of “the tithes of his demesne, assigning it [them] for the purpose of pur-chasing,” a point wholly interpolated by the translator, “and pro-viding books for the monks: for this Robert was a man of letters, and “a diligent hearer and lover of the Scriptures,” a mistranslation completely ridiculous, and contrary to the whole context. “The tithes of “Redburn,” rather, some tithes in Redburn, “were assigned for the “same purpose,” rather, were additionally assigned for the same purpose. What, however, was the purpose? That, as appears before, of purchasing and providing books. “And the best writers and copyists “were sought for far and near, for”—purchasing and providing books, as the analogy of the argument, so interpolated, requires the sequel to run; but, as the mention of “writers and copyists” now shews the argument should have been before, and as, in fact, the sequel runs, in the words immediately following, for—“transcribing books; and their “diet so provided for them, that they might never be taken off or hindered,” the words, “taken off, or” being as spurious as they are superfluous,

† Paris, 1003: “Contulit quidam nobilis, armis strenuus, natione Neuster, huic ecclesie (tempore et persuasa hujus abbatis Pauli) duas partes decimarum de suo dominio in villâ de Hatfield,—et assignavit (sic volente abbate Paulo, scripturarum amatore) ad volumina ecclesie necessaria, facienda. Erat autem miles ille literatus, diligens auditor et amator scripturarum. Ad quod officium, additæ sunt quædam decimæ in Redburnâ; et constituit quædam diaria dari scriptoribus,—ne scriptores impedirentur—. Ibique fecit abbas, ab electis et procul quæsitis scriptoribus scribi nobilia volumina ecclesie necessaria.” The tithes thus assigned are called by Paris expressly, “decimarum scriptorio collatarum;” and, “in ipso quod construxit scriptorio, libros [Paulus] scribi fecit.”

fluous, “in this employment†.” So very contradictory is one half of this passage made to the other, and so wildly inaccurate is the whole! Yet so invariably, so necessarily indeed, was a scriptorium a part of every monastery! By the rules of Evesham, the præcentor was obliged to find, from the tithes and lands allotted him, “enamel for all the “writers of the monastery, and parchment for briefs,” another term borrowed by the lawyers from the monks, but originally signifying what? the heads, or contents of chapters? “and colours for illuminating “books, and necessities for binding them§.” The scriptorium then, in our priory of St. German’s, was in all probability a room closely adjoining to the library, as its relation to the library would naturally give a proximity to it, but now used in the growing attentions of the age to neatness of dress, as that modern apartment in the mansion of a “baron “bold,” the dressing-room of my lord.

With such a scriptorium and such a library, however, the priory may never have produced a single author, as every priory cannot be expected to produce one. Yet ours has one little known to fame at present, though well known formerly. Fame, indeed, is merely a circle formed upon the surface of a lake, at its amplest extent, confined within narrow limits, diffusing itself slowly for a while, and soon lost in the very tenuity of its substance. Thus we know not, in general, the very names of the monks or priors of St. German’s, yet are acquainted with one name in particular, that of a mere deacon in orders, but of a writer once in such celebrity, as to be rescued from the oblivion which has covered all the rest, and to be transmitted with reputation unto our own times. “HUCAR,” cries Leland, the happy vindicator of his fame, “shone out “brightly, an honour of no slight quality to Cornwall, as far as relates “to that divine kind of knowledge, an acquaintance with theology; and “at a period particularly,” that of the Danish ravages, “in which “through almost all Europe good letters were nearly annihilated, by the “barbarism prevailing on every side. But, that he might run the

† Newcome, 48.

§ Monasticon, i. 147: “Incaustum omnibus scriptoribus monasterii, et pergamenum ad brevia, et colores ad illuminandum, et necessaria ad ligandum, libros.”

“course of his studies with more success,” he did—what? According to Mr. Newcome’s theory, he must have retired to any place—except a monastery. Yet to a monastery he actually retired. “He repaired to the church of St. German in his own country. There also, being ordained a deacon, he prudently gained the good opinion of all, partly “by his preaching, partly also by his writing. But he wrote a hundred and eight homilies, and in his preface to the volume” containing them “writes thus: ‘Such a book as this, which is a collection formed “by me Hucar, an inconsiderable man of slender talents, should have “such a preface as this.’ And in the same place he speaks thus: ‘But “yet these discourses, however collected by me who dwell a humble “deacon in the very distant region of Cornwall, let him accept who likes “them; and, if he will not applaud them, I beg he will not carp at “them.’” Many then continued deacons for life, as most priests continue priests at present; and had their peculiar parts of the clerical office assigned them. Thus one of them attended the bishop for the execution of his office, was thus made archdeacon, or superintendant over the rest, and thus too usurped an authority even over those who were his superiors in orders, the priests or presbyters, with their archi-presbyters or rural deans at their head. The first archdeacon mentioned in our national records, is Wlfræd, a Saxon, who subscribes the resolutions of one synod in 798, of another in 803, professedly as archdeacon, and apparently as a dignitary, after the bishops; but more explicitly witnesses a royal charter of donation in 808, as archdeacon of Canterbury*. Even at an earlier period, about 650, occurs “Thomas†, his deacon,” on the death of Felix the bishop of Dunwich, and succeeds him as bishop. “And that his reader might not be ignorant” of some points touched upon by his sermons, “he prefixed “to his work a few constitutions, taken indeed from the book “of Ecclesiastical Constitutions of Egbert, the archbishop of York “[about 750], who was formerly the preceptor of Flaccus Albinus “[or Alcuinus], a man peculiarly famous for his literature.” Or, as

* Battely, 145, 146.

† Wharton’s Anglia Sacra, i, 403: “Thomas diaconus suus.”

Leland writes in another place concerning Egbert's Constitutions, "this book, Hucar, a deacon of St. German's in Cornwall, carefully reduced into an abridgment."—"That original work of Hucar's had travelled, I know not how, even to Canterbury; from whence it was transported by a certain monk to Oxford, and lodged in the library of Canterbury college," now Canterbury quadrangle in the college of Christchurch; "as the same fate has befallen other volumes, both many and ancient, the whole furniture of this library being derived from St. Saviour's at Canterbury," in consequence of the connexion naturally subsisting between the monastery and the college, this bearing the name and receiving the patronage of that†. We thus find one author, at least, belonging to this society, the preacher to it, the publisher also of 108 sermons in one volume, celebrated therefore within the walls of the priory for his style of preaching, and equally celebrated without the walls for his strain of writing.

What however is now become of Hucar's work, of the St. German's library, of all the monastic libraries in general? They who accused the monks of Gothic ignorance, would be sure to correct in themselves

† De Script. Brit. 168: "Hucarius, Corinæ non levis [honor], quantum ad theologiæ cognitionem divinam quidem illam pertinet, famâ enituit; et eo potissimum tempore," explained in p. 173 to mean the Danish devastations, "quo bonæ per universam fere Europam literæ, barbarie undecunque prævalente, tantum non interierant. Ut autem studiorum cursum felicius absolveret, Fanum Germano sacrum apud suos petiit; ubi et, Levita factus, partim concionando, partim etiam scribendo, insignem apud cunctos gratiam sibi comparavit. Scripsit autem homilias centum et octo, et in hujus libelli prologo sic scribit, 'Talis liber, a me Hucaro, exigui ingenii homunculo, in unum collectus, talem habeat prologum,' et ibidem, 'Sed tamen hæc, utcumque a me collecta qui in ultimis Cornu-galliæ partibus humilis Levita habito, cui placuerint accipiat; et si laudare noluerit, peto ne carpat.' Et, ne lector ignarus sit, præfixit operi paucas constitutiones, decerptas quidem ex libro Constitutionum Ecclesiasticarum Egberti, archiepiscopi Eboracensis, olim præceptoris Flacci Albin, viri literarum titulo vel clarissimi. Pervenerat, quo nescio casu, Hucarii opus vel Durovernum usque Cantiorum; unde a monacho quodam translatum est ad Isidis Vadum, et bibliothecæ collegii Cantiani commendatum: id quod et aliis exemplaribus, cum multis tum antiquis, contigit; tota enim hujus bibliothecæ suppellex a Fano Servatoris Duroverni translata est." Ibid. 114: "Hunc librum Hucarus, Fani Germani in Coriniâ Levita, studiosè in compendium redegit."

what they condemned in the others, to use industriously those libraries which the others had so grossly neglected, and thus to turn their very books as stormed batteries against them. So, in common sense, they should have acted; and so, for that very reason, does the world believe them to have acted. But the accusers of the monks as Goths were actually Goths themselves, Goths warring again with the literature of Rome, and Goths consigning the literary treasures of the age to a sweeping storm of destruction. To the present generation of the reformed, this seems utterly incredible; yet is dreadfully true. Henry VIII. that wilful wayward child of violence, stood like another Genseric or Alaric, tearing down the sun of literature from its sphere, and burying the whole country in darkness. We even see him so standing, in the striking portrait of him drawn by a cotemporary, a spectator, and a friend. "Never had we bene offended," cries even Bale, that strenuous enemy to the monks, "for the loss of our libraryes, beyng so many in nombre, and in so desolate places for the more parte; yf the chiefe momments and most notable workes of our most excellent wryters, had bene reserved. If there had bene in every shyre in Englande, but one solempne librerye, to the preservacyon of those noble workes, and preferment of good lernynge in oure posteritye; it had bene sumwhat. But to destroye all without consideracyon, is and wyll be unto Englande for ever a most horryble infamy, amonge the grave senyours of other nacyons. A great nombre of them whych purchased those superstycyouse mansyons, reserved of those library bokes, some to serve theyr jakes, some to scoure their candlestycks, and some to rubbe their bootes. Some they sold to the grossers and sopesellers, and some they sent over see to the bokebynders, not in small nombre, but at tymes whole shyppes full, to the wonderynge of foren nacyons. Yea, the universytees of this realme are not all clere in this detestable fact. But cursed is that bellye, whyche seketh to be fedde with suche ungodly gaynes, and so depelye shameth his natural countrey. I know a merchant-man, whych shall at thys tyme be namelesse, that bought the contentes of two noble lybraryes for forty shillings pryce; a shame it is, to be spoken. Thys stuffe hath he occupied in the stede of graye paper, by the space of more than these ten years; and yet he had “store ynough for as many years to come. A prodigyouse example is this, and to be abhorred of all men which love their nation as they should do.*” The last is very similar to that ever-memorable deed of destruction, by which the library of Alexandria was distributed as waste paper during a course of six months, to light the fires of wood under the four thousand baths there. And the madness of Mahometans overtopping all the rage of Goths, so ranking Omar higher in infamy than either Alaric or Genseric, was now apparent upon earth again, in the person of our half-protestant, half-popish, but wholly savage king Henry.

I have thus laid open to the mind's eye, what is so little known to us Protestants at present, the interiors of a priory. We are accustomed only to view the environing walls with awe, and to deplore the fanaticism that reduced the buildings into mere walls. But the habits and modes of life, which a monk formerly practised within, are as little known to the generality, as the modes and habits of the man in the moon. I have therefore dwelt the more circumstantially, upon the disposition of this priory within. Such a plan for the history of an abbey I formerly recommended to the late Mr. West, who published, in 1774, “The Antiquities of Furness, or an Account of the royal Abbey of St. Mary” there. He, as a clergyman of the Romish church, and a scholar bred in a monastery abroad, might have expatiated with a freer plenitude of ideas upon the point, than we clergymen of the church of England can. I believe him too to have possessed so much probity of spirit, and to have acquired such a compass of knowledge, as would have directed and heightened his personal familiarity with monastic

* Steevens's Preface to his own Monasticon, p. x. See also Bale's whole work, a preface, in Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood, i. iii. &c. In another work of Bale's is this observation additional: “The tyme hath bene,” he cries, “when it [London] hath had a great nombre of the noblest libraries in all Christendome; their destruccyon at this daye, of men godly mynded is much to be lamented.—Among the stacyoners and tokelynders, I found many notable antiquitees; of whom I wrote out the tytyles, tymes, and begynnynges.— I have bene also at Norwyche, our seconde cytie of name; and there all the library monumentes are turned to the use of their grossers, candelmakers, sopesellers, and other worldly occupyers.” manners. I even mentioned the suggestion soon afterwards to one, whom I am proud to have frequently visited on a fair footing of equality, to have then done what I believe only one man besides to have done, the late Mr. Beauclerc, opposed him freely whenever I differed from him in opinion, yet to have enjoyed no small portion of his personal respectfulness, the late Dr. Johnson; and he gave it his full approbation, Shook his ambrosial curls, and gave the nod,

The stamp of fate, and sanction of the god;

But I was too late in my recommendation to Mr. West; as he was then in London, attending the press for publication. Nor has any attempt been made since to carry the plan into execution, except by Mr. Newcome, the historian of St. Alban's abbey; who, possessing a vein of good sense and a spirit of observation, has delineated the manners of a monastery, with the pencil of a monk, though with the colouring of a Protestant; yet reposing in confidence on the accuracy of his touches, and indolently careless about the justness of his colours, has given us a representation on the whole, however we may allow praise to parts, violating propriety by fantasticalness, destroying uniformity by contradictoriness, and distorting truth by falsehood.

SECTION IV.

HAVING now traced the alterations made in the priory and the church, subsequent to the original constructions; I have one point more to notice at the end of all, concerning the episcopate once attached to both.

“As to the time that this place enjoyed this honour,” observes our old associate and useful intelligencer Mr. Willis, in his parting words, “I can only judge it to have been about 113 [115] years, viz. from the year 936 to 1049 [1050]; and from Leland may guess, that eleven bishops “ sat

“sat here*.” Mr. Willis thus goes on like another Vulcan, in his kind and amiable ministeries to the gods of literature; limping to the very close†. He forgets what he has remarked himself just before, and thus confounds what Leland has asserted.

He himself has told us only nine or ten lines before, “that the first “bishop—was Athelstan,” who was nominated (according to Mr. Willis himself) in 905‡, and “who was succeeded by Conan,” in 936§. We thus lengthen Mr. Willis’s own period, with the addition of many years. But as the see must certainly have been erected, when the kingdom was set up; when Christianity retired with her priests and bishops, before the victorious heathens of Germany; when Cornwall became independent of Devonshire, in matters spiritual as well as secular; the prelacy will mount up with the royalty, as I have carried it, to the very beginning of the seventh century. Thus will more than THREE CENTURIES be annexed to its duration; and the whole period of its continuance be almost FOUR AGES AND A HALF. We cannot indeed pretend to measure such a chronology as this, by the standard of a few years; any more than we can estimate the distance of the fixed stars, by a yard or a pole. We must take a half or a whole diameter of the earth, for this work; and centuries half or whole for that.

Nor has Leland said any thing so contrary to my reasoning, as what Mr. Willis imagines he has; and so grossly false in itself, as that only eleven bishops sat here. He says merely, in the passage which is so familiar to our eyes at present, that “beside the hye altare of the “same priory [church], on the ryght hand, ys a tūmbe yn the walle—,

* Willis, 142.

† Iliad, i. 599, 600:

Λοβίτος δ' αὖ ἐνὶ γέλωι μακαρίσσι θείῳιν,
ὣς ἰδὼν Ἠφαιστον διὰ θυμῷα πομπηνεύεια.

Vulcan with awkward grace his office plies,
And unextinguish'd laughter shakes the skies.—POPE.

‡ Willis, 141.

§ Ibid. 142.

“ and over the tumbre a xi bisshops paynted,—as token of so many bisshops “ biried theere, or that ther had beene so many bisshoppes of Cornwalle, “ that had theyr secte [seate] theer ||.” Mr. Willis takes one member of the alternative, when Leland presents both; and so makes him lean decisively to one of the sides, when he really inclines to neither. He thus gives a false turn to Leland’s account. Mr. Willis has also taken the latter member of the alternative, when in reason and propriety he ought to have taken the former. But, what is infinitely more absurd than either, he here continues the egregious blunder, which we have seen him beginning before*, in a strange wildness of misapprehension, he having fancied, and still fancying, this tomb in the chancel to be that in the south aile, so placing “ beside the hye altare” what is not in the eastern end of the aile at all, what is near the very middle of the aile, what is even to the west of the middle. By this astonishing act of oscitancy, he lost a long succession of bishops, all prior to the construction of the chancel, all coæval with the cathedral preceding it.

How many these were, it is impossible to ascertain. Tradition, which once told me of three, and another time of four, upon closer examination could not specify any number. The four and the three, I then found, were only the creatures of an imagination, that was con- ceiving from the general tradition, and deriving marks of division upon its conception from the view of the plates before it †. Three plates were very apparent in themselves formerly, and are in their places at present.
 But a fourth is also apparent, on a strict survey. The number of bishops, however, must have been much, very much greater than either, in the three centuries preceding the erection of the chancel.
 The number of twelve (for twelve, not eleven, I have noted before ‡ to be the real number) in little more than a century subsequent, shews the || Leland’s Itin. vii. 122; my vi. 4, and ii. 4.

* In iii. 2.

† I allude to that very curious principle in physics, disclosed in Genesis, xxx. 39: “The “ flocks conceived before the rods,” which were peeled round in streaks, were therefore spotted and speckled in appearance, “ and brought forth cattle ring-straked, speckled, and “ spotted.”

‡ See vi. 4.

truth of the assertion, and indicates the amount of all. More than thirty bishops sat in the throne of St. German's, before the reign of Athelstan; as exactly twelve sat after it. Those are all, except St. Rumon, I believe, buried near the cenotaph in their old cathedral; the earlier close to it, I suppose, the later receding more and more from it; till the whole range of the original church, perhaps, has now its soil made up nearly of mould, that once was episcopal. And the lawn, which occupies the whole extent of the ancient chancel at present, lies lightly with its turf over remains much less numerous in themselves, but equally episcopal in their nature.

CONCLUSION.

IN this manner was a prelaey and a royalty established formerly among the Cornish; Cornwall being modelled at once into a kingdom and a bishopric. In this manner too, was the metropolis of the latter settled at St. German's, and the capital of the former fixed at Lescard. Both went on in the same course of continuance, till the power of the Saxons, like an Alpine snowball, growing with its own progress, and swelling from its own accumulations, came rushing upon them both with an overwhelming sweep of violence. Then the secular monarchy was buried for ever, but the ecclesiastical still reared its head above the waste. The Cornish episcopate remained, under the sway of the Saxons; and even received a magnificent addition to its cathedral, from the Christianity imbibed by the Saxons on their settlement among Christians. Nor did the Normans come to St. German's, with the Saxon heathenism renewed upon these seeming Saxons of Denmark. They came with the Christianity of the Saxons, communicated equally to the Normans by the Christians of France; and with the architecture of France, improved by its nearer neighbourhood to Italy. They came to lend more elegance and more grandeur to the British, to the Saxon church of the Cornish see. Even when this see migrated to Exeter, it merely reverted back to its original abode; and the current, after many wanderings to the right or left, only rejoined the ocean from which it had sprung before.

In tracing this current, I have been enabled to lay before my reader many a fine object upon the banks, important in itself and in its consequences, important to Cornwall in particular, important to the island in general. I have displayed that period of the Cornish history, in the full light of historical radiance ; which has hitherto been buried in the clouds and mists of ignorance, yet concerns the very saints, male or female, that almost every parish acknowledges in its name, that almost every town honours in its wake, and that form a necessary link in the chain of Cornish history. But I have not confined myself, like a liminary intelligencer, to this peculiar orb. I have ranged over the island, held up the origin of Gothic and of modern architecture within it, the origin of chess, the origin of free-masons, the origin of armorial bearings ; pointed out the period at which all the grander parts of our large churches, the chancel, the nave, or the aisle, the bell-tower, the lantern, the spire, or the chapel, were added to them, or at which those peculiar decorations of our cathedrals, the mitre, the crosier, or the throne, appeared within them ; and exhibiting several churches in Britain, as built by the very Romans themselves, yet existent still in part or in whole among us. I have shewn the abbey-church of St. Alban's, in direct contradiction to its own historian, to be one of the number. In doing all this, I flatter myself I have been usefully employed, have added something to the stock of antiquarian knowledge, have enlarged somewhat the bounds of historical certainty, and have broke open some new fountains of intelligence, historical or antiquarian, for the benefit of the public.

A P P E N D I X.

No. I.

ON THE ORIGIN OF CHESS.

FROM THE ENGLISH REVIEW OF JANUARY AND FEBRUARY 1792.

Archæologia, or Miscellaneous Tracts relating to Antiquity. Published by the Society of Antiquaries of London. Volume IX.

4. An Historical Disquisition on the Game of Chess—; by the Hon. Daines Barrington.

‘MR. BARRINGTON, who, in the eighth volume of these antiquarian papers, laid himself out to explain the origin of card-playing in England, here attempts to explain equally the origin of chess-playing in the world at large. The point is curious, much learning is collected to bear upon it, yet the conviction does not keep pace with the conclusion. This tardiness of faith in us may be in some measure imputed to our want of knowledge in the game itself. But it must also be imputed, we think, to the defective evidences and the feeble reasonings of the author.

“It seems to be generally agreed,” says Mr. Barrington, “that we derive chess from Asia, and most writers have supposed from Persia” [a note adds, “from the names of some of the pieces”]; “but I cannot give up the claim of the Chinese as inventors, though Hyde inclines against it” in his History of eastern Games, “and chiefly because they,” the Chinese, “have some additional pieces, which differ from ours both in their form and powers. This single circumstance, however, by no means appears conclusive to me; because in all countries, “where

“ where any game hath been of long continuance, the players will make “ innovations, though it remains the same in substance. Du Halde, how“ ever, cites a Chinese treatise ; by which it appears, that it is the favou“ rite game of that country, and as such is sometimes depicted upon Chi“ nese paper. In Thibet also chess is much in vogue, as it is throughout “ Bengal and Indostan, with a native of which I have myself played, nor “ do the moves or rules differ materially from our own. It is therefore “ highly probable, that Thibet and Indostan received chess from the long-“ civilized empire of China, rather than from Persia, which it might reach “ in its progress westward through Indostan.” That Indostan, Bengal, Thibet, China, and Persia, ‘ all have the game of chess among them, is ‘ very apparent* from these evidences. But which is the mother-country ‘ of the game, does not appear. The long civility of China, even if the ‘ fact be certain, is no argument in favour of that country. Incivility, ‘ rudeness, and barbarism, delight in games of chance equally with ‘ modern refinement itself. An English peasant loves cards as much as ‘ Milord Anglois. And, in the highest luxury of Rome, Tacitus noticed ‘ with astonishment the infatuated propensity of those Indian-like tribes
 ‘ the Germans, for gaming with dice. “ Aleam,” he says, “ quod mirere, “ sobrii inter seria exercent, tantâ lucrandi perdendive temeritate, ut cum “ omnia defecerunt, extremo ac novissimo jactu de libertate et de corpore “ contendant *.” Arthur’s, in all its exorbitance of gaming, never wit‘ nessed such a stake as his ; though it was in Tacitus’s time very common ‘ in Germany, and even characteristic of the nation. Mr. Barrington, in‘ deed, only states it as “ highly probable,” that chess came from China.
 ‘ But the probability is nothing, when we take away the argument from ‘ civility. Indeed the probability is all on the other side, on the very side ‘ against which Mr. Barrington is contending. Persia may still claim the ‘ honour, if an honour it be, of giving the game of chess to the world ; ‘ notwithstanding all, that Mr. Barrington has advanced hitherto. When ‘ Persia, China, Thibet, Bengal, and Indostan, have equally the game ;
 ‘ when, in the last countries, “ the moves or rules” do not “ differ mate- “ rially from our own ;” when the Chinese “ have some additional pieces,

* De Mor. Ger. xxiv.

“ which”

“ which” do “ differ from ours both in their form and powers;” and “ when “ the names of some of the pieces” in our own chess are actu‘ ally Persian at this day : the probability is clearly in favour of Thibet, ‘ Bengal, and Indostan, preferably to China, and the balance turns de‘ cidedly in preference of Persia to all.

‘ Mr. Barrington having thus examined the Chinese claim to the in‘ vention, goes on to consider the Grecian. The first passage adduced
 ‘ for it, he remarks, “ is a line in the first book of the Odyssey, where it “ is said that Penelope’s suitors thus amused themselves before the gates “ of Ulysses’s palace :

Πεσσοισι προπαροιῶν θυμὸν ἔειπον*.

“ As it took place, however, in the open air, it is much more likely that “ it resembled a very common game at every school, called hop-scot, than “ the sedentary amusement of chess. Unfortunately for the former sup“ position, Athenæus in his first book gives us from a native of Ithaca “ (whose name was Cteson), a very particular account of the method of “ playing the game of παιτῖαι by Penelope’s suitors, which differs most “ materially from chess, as the pieces were in number 108 instead of 32.
 “ The principal piece moreover (named Penelope) was placed in the va“ cant space between the two sets, whilst each player endeavoured to “ strike Penelope twice ; in which if he succeeded, he was supposed to “ have better pretensions than the other suitors.” This passage, we are

* The reviewer would have remarked if he had known, that there is a passage in the Iliad, which shews the use of chess at a much earlier period ; when Patroclus was yet a boy, and killed another boy in a passion at chess :

Ἡμᾶς τε, οἳ παῖδα κατέκτανον Ἀμφιδαμανίης, Νηπιοῖ, καὶ ἐβόων, ἀμάρ' ἈΣΤΡΑΓΑΛΟῖσι χολαδίει. xxxiii. 87, 88.

Mr. Pope has strangely omitted the whole passage in his translation, though extended into no less than six lines in the original, and though so important in the history of Patroclus’s connexion with Achilles. The father of Achilles then took Patroclus into his own family, bred him up, and constituted him an attendant upon his son.

Εὐθὺς μὲ δειξάμενος τὸ δαμασκὸν ἐπὶ τοῖα Πηλεΐ, ἔβριτ' ἑ' ὠδύνας, καὶ γο. βραπτοῖ' αἰομένην. 89, 90.

‘ sorry to say so, is peculiarly confused and erroneous. That the game, whatever it was, was “played in the open air,” is not true. It was played in the very portico, within which the suitors were equally feasting.

There, in the portal plac’d, the heav’n-born maid
Enormous riot and misrule survey’d.
On hides of bees, before the palace-gate, (Sad spoils of luxury) the suitors sat.
With rival art, and ardour in their mien,
At chess they vie, to captivate the queen;
Divining of their loves.

‘ Even if the game had been “in the open air,” Mr. Barrington surely is under a strange influence of injudiciousness, in setting the suitors of Penelope to play at “hop-scot” for her. Burlesque itself could not go beyond this. But Mr. Barrington himself, without seeming to know what he is doing, instantly sweeps away this score of “hop-scot” with his hand, by giving us an authentic account of what the game was. “A native of Ithaca” lends him the account. From this the game is apparently not “hop-scot,” but sedentary like chess, and probably, as Mr. Pope has stated it, chess itself. “Unfortunately for the former supposition,” says Mr. Barrington concerning the game being chess, when it is decidedly unfortunate for the latter, concerning the play being hop-scot; “Athenæus in his first book gives us,” &c. By this account, as Mr. Barrington adds, “the game of παιγμα by Penelope’s suitors,—differs most materially from chess, as the pieces were in number 108 instead of 32.” Yet we find from a passage and a note before, that “the board at arch-chess,” which he thinks is an Italian addition to the original chess, “had 100 squares instead of 64 *;” and, in opposition to what is alleged in favour of the descent of chess from the Chinese, that “they have some additional pieces, which differ from ours both in their form and powers.” The number of the pieces therefore, by Mr. Barrington’s own confession before, can be no argument against the identity of the game. Mr. Barrington indeed argues previously himself, that “in all countries, where any game hath been of long continuance,

* ‘ P. 17.’

“ the players will make innovations, though it remains the same in substance.” And those variations in the number of pieces may be (according to Mr. Barrington himself) as much innovations of this kind in the chess of Ithaca, as they avowedly are in the arch-chess of Italy ; and as much the result of a long continuance there. But Mr. Barrington next objects, that the game was substantially different from chess. “ The principal piece (named Penelope),” he says, “ was placed in the vacant space between the two sets, whilst each player endeavoured to strike Penelope twice.” But let us attend to the more circumstantial account, which Mr. Pope (or rather his hired translator) has given us from Eustathius on the place†. “ The number of the suitors being one hundred and eight, they equally divided their men or balls‡; that is to say, fifty-four on each side : these were placed on the board opposite to each other. Between the two sides was a vacant space, in the midst of which was the main mark, or queen, the point which all were to aim at. They took their turns by lot ; he who took or displaced that mark, got his own in its place ; and if, by a second man, he again took it, without touching any of the others, he won the game.” We know nothing of chess, and therefore may be mistaken in what we are going to say. But this appears to us very similar to what Mr. Barrington himself tells us, that “ the putting the enemy’s king,” at Ithaca called a queen, by the suitors named Penelope, and only one to the two sets of combatants, “ in such a situation that he cannot be extricated” without being taken, “ is the great object of each player §.” There is certainly such a substantial similarity between chess and that, as shews it demonstrably not to be hop-scot, and evinces it probably to be chess. If it is not chess, what other game can it possibly be ? If chess was actually meant by Athenæus, with the variations in playing the game

† And, as this reviewer should in justice to his argument have added from Mr. Pope’s Eustathius, “ Athenæus relates it from Apian the Grammarian, who had it from Cteson, a native of Ithaca, that the sport was in this manner.”

‡ Balls ! The pieces were nearly globular, and were therefore called “ pilæ ” by the Romans. See Ovid in a long note hereafter.

§ This reviewer should have referred to p. 18.

‘ that seem to have taken place at Ithaca, could he in his short description have pointed it out more significantly?

‘ But “ though chess is supposed to have been known thus early in Ithaca, yet the invention of this ingenious game hath been commonly attributed to Palamedes *. The chief authority, however, for his being the inventor of chess, is the following line from Sophocles :

Εφευρε [sc. Palamedes] πεισοδοις, κυβοις τι, τερπνον αχλως αλγος.

‘ A note adds : “ By this line the invention of dice is also attributed to Palamedes ; which ingenious discovery, it is much wished for the benefit of society, that he had reserved to himself.” That Palamedes at Troy was the inventor of the game of πεισοι, whether it be chess or not, is historically impossible to be true. We see the game actually played at Ithaca, when Ulysses and his soldiers were not yet returned from Troy. Nor does the passage in Sophocles affirm any such thing : it only alleges, that “ he found amusement, as the cure of idleness, in “ πεισοι and in dice ;” just as the suitors are said before to have “ amused themselves” in the same manner, πεισοισι θυμον εἰρπεν. And dice were so little the invention of Palamedes, that they must have been known for ages before the complicated game of the πεισοι was invented ; being the simplest, and therefore the oldest, of all those instruments which the selfishness of man has fabricated, for giving employment to such as can find none for themselves, and so enabling them to escape from “ the rack of a too easy chair.” We have already seen the dice rattled by the earliest Germans, with more than the bardy desperation of a knight of industry at the German Spa now.

‘ Mr. Barrington proceeds to the Roman claim of inventing chess. He accordingly produces two passages, one from Ovid, which “ no person,” he affirms, “ who is acquainted with the moves even at chess, can read —with attention, and conceive that it is alluded to ;” and another from

* The reviewer should have here cited this passage in Mr. Pope : “ It is said, this game “ was invented by Palamedes, during the siege of Troy.”

‘ a poem sometimes ascribed to Lucan, which “ must be allowed,” he owns, “ to contain stronger allusions to what may be deemed chess, than any of the other passages which have been quoted,” but which, he still thinks, does not mean it. We can only say, that this may be so. But we are not convinced that it is †.

“ The first mention which I have happened to meet with of a game that bears any affinity to scacchia or chess is, that in Du Fresne’s “ ‘ Glossarium mediæ et infimæ Græcitatîs’ under the article Ζατρίκιον ; “ where he cites a passage alluding to it from Anna Commena’s 12th “ book of her Alexias, as well as others from the Byzantine historians. “ It is there stated, that the Persians call it σατρίκιζ, whilst the Constanti- “ nopolitan name is σκακον.—Sir Elijah Impey informs me, that the “ board is still called satringe in Bengal. It was rather a common game “ at Constantinople in the twelfth century, when Anna Commena flour- “ rished: and this, I conceive, will account for its introduction into “ Europe.” It is peculiarly unfortunate for an author to trip up his own “ heels in this wrestling of controversy. Mr. Barrington is endeavouring, “ we know, to disprove the Persian origin of chess in favour of a “ Chinese one: yet we have seen him acknowledging before, that, even “ in our own chess, “ the names of some of the pieces” are Persian. And “ now we find, that the very name at Bengal for the board itself, is the “ very same that was used in Persia many centuries ago. So far, there- “ fore, Persia appears the common centre of radiation (if we may use so “ sublime an allusion for so petty an object), to Bengal at one extremity of “ the globe, and to Britain at another, for the science of chess-playing. “ Nor will the commonness of the game at Constantinople in the twelfth “ century, account for its introduction into Europe. It was known and “ familiar in western Europe, during the eleventh. This appears from a “ very picturesque passage in our own Malmesbury’s account of the crus- “ sades. “ Anno ab Incarnatione 1095,” he tells us, “ —hanc—civitatem

† From what follows in the reviewer’s argument, coupled with these concessions so singularly ingenious in Mr. Barrington, the reviewer might have fairly presumed, I think, that the lines allude actually to chess.

“ [Antioch] Franci ab Octobri usque ad Junium [in 1096] circumsedére.— “ Aoxianus—civitatis ammiratus,” emir of the city, “—Sansadolem “ filium ad Soldanum imperatorem Persidis misit—: Soldanus apud “ Persas,—omnium Sarracenorum rector.” The Christians however ‘ took the town before the Persian succours arrived. These came just ‘ afterwards, and blocked up the Christians in the town. “ Venerant illi
 “ a Sansadole invitati, duce Corbaguath satrapâ orientali, qui ab impera-
 “ tore Persidis acceperat trecenta millia cum viginti septem ammiratis.”
 ‘ The Christians became distressed. “ Quapropter, triduo prius cum “ letaniis exacto jejunio, legatus Petrus Heremita mittitur ad Turcos.”
 ‘ He went, and made his proposals. “ Non erat Corbaguath ejus facilita“ tis, ut legatum dignaretur responso; sed schaccis ludens, et dentibus “ intrendens, inanem dimisit—. Ille—, concitè rediens, exercitum de in“ solentia Turci certiores reddidit ‡.” In this very striking delineation, ‘ we see the Turkish general of Persia, in the midst of war, and at the ‘ very reception of a legate from the enemy, playing at the Persian game
 ‘ of chess; we behold Peter the Hermit so well acquainted with the ‘ game, as to report it under its proper appellation to his European ‘ brethren; and we even find an historian in Britain, within a very few ‘ years afterwards §, reciting the incident, and repeating the appellation, ‘ as quite familiar to him and to his countrymen. All intimates the Per‘ sian origin of the game, and all indicates its early introduction into ‘ Britain itself.

“ In the first crusades, before the destruction of the Eastern empire, the “ adventurers often made a stay at Constantinople (the emperors of which “ were generally friendly to the Christian cause); and thus probably be“ came acquainted with this bewitching game, which they introduced on “ their return to their respective countries.” But we have already shewn, ‘ that Europe in general, and Britain in particular, were well acquainted ‘ with the game before the return from the very first crusade.

“ I cannot but dissent from Hyde’s most learned treatise on this game, “ when he seems to suppose it known in England about the time of the ‡ ‘ Malmesbury, fol. 73 and 78.’

§ ‘ Malmesbury, fol. 98.’

“ Conquest, from the court of exchequer having been then first established. Now true it is, that the barons of the exchequer sit with a table before them, which is covered with a chequered cloth; but the use of this cloth is, for settling the accounts to be passed before this court.—It is possible that the chequer being so common a sign for a public-house, may have formerly been for the same reason of changing the reckoning; and it is remarkable that the same sign was used at ancient Pompeii, as appears by the engravings which are inserted in the fourth volume of the Archæologia.” We have already seen the scacchi a game, played by the general of the Persians, and familiar to the most westerly Europeans, in 1096; just thirty years only after the Conquest. Hyde therefore seems to have a strong probability in his favour, when “ he seems to suppose it known in England about the time of the Conquest.” But Mr. Barrington will not allow his supposition, because it is founded only on the establishment of the court of exchequer then. This, he insinuates, for he does not argue, derives its appellation only from the chequered cloth, with which the table of the court is covered, and by the chequers of which the officers of the court used to compute sums. Mr. Barrington, however, is as erroneous as he is popular in this insinuation. The court carries the very name of the game, the name appropriate to it at Constantinople and in Malmesbury before; that of scacchus. “ Ab ipsâ regni conquisitione,” says Ger-vase of Tilbury*, who lived within a hundred years after the Conquest, and wrote a set treatise on the exchequer, “ per regem Gulielmum facta hæc curia cœpisse dicitur, sumptâ tamen ejus ratione a scacchario transmarino.” The exchequer of Tilbury therefore unites with the chess of Malmesbury, to shew the familiarity of the name and game among our own ancestors, as early at least as the Conquest. But a court of exchequer appears to have been previously erected, under the same appellation of scaccharium, upon the continent. The existence

* This author, with whom I so cordially unite in sentiment, and whom indeed, as I must say in the language of Ben Jonson concerning Shakespeare, “ I honour as much as any man on this side idolatry,” has here committed a mistake, which is corrected in the body of my work, iii. 3.

‘ and the appellation of our own, were only borrowed “ a scacchario “ transmarino.” This therefore coincides with Malmesbury again, to ‘ shew how Peter and the other crusaders came to know so very readily
 ‘ the game, which the Persian general was playing.

‘ Yet how came the continental and island exchequers to take the ap‘ pellation of scaccharium? Gervase himself shall tell us, and so concur ‘ in part with, and in part correct, Mr. Barrington and the mass of ‘ writers. “ Scaccharium,” he says, “ est tabula quadrangula, quæ lon-“ gitudine quasi decem pedum, et quinque latitudine, ad modum mensæ “ circumscidentibus apposita, undique habet limbum latitudinis quasi “ quatuor digitorum, supponitur scacchario annus in termino Paschæ “ emptus, non quilibet, sed niger virgis distinctus, distantibus a se vir-“ gis vel pedis vel palmæ extentæ spatio*.” The court, then, took its ‘ name from the cloth †. Yet the question still recurs, and is only varied ‘ in the object. Whence, we must now ask, did the cloth itself derive its ‘ name? Evidently from its similitude to a chess-board. The appella‘ tion of the game, scacchus, had directly communicated itself in scaccha- ‘ rium to the board, and indirectly or allusively to any thing resembling ‘ it in appearance. Cloths, resembling it in having a set of diversified ‘ squares upon them, were distinguished by its name, and were said to be ‘ scaccharia or chequered. Just so, as Mr. Barrington himself informs ‘ us, in p. 24 preceding, the chess-board being called satringe in Bengal, ‘ there this “ term also signifies a carpet, from its being generally
 “ chequered as the chess-board is.” How strongly therefore does this

* ‘ Camdeni Britannia, p. 129, edit. 1607.’ But Camden’s copy was very erroneous. The very citation in Camden shews it to be so. And “ Scaccarium tabula est quadrangula,” says Madox’s copy, ii. 353, “ quæ longitudinis quasi decem pedum, latitudinis quinque, ad “ modum mensæ circumscidentibus apposita, undique habet limbum altitudinis quatuor digi-“ torum, ne quid appositum excidat. Super-ponitur autem scaccario superior pannus in “ termino Paschæ emptus, non quilibet, sed,” &c.

† The reviewer’s reasoning here seems at first sight, to be different from what it should be; and exchequer seems to be the name, not of the cloth, but of the table itself. “ Scacca“ ritum est tabula.” Yet, on deeper consideration, I see he is right. The table had no chequers upon it, but the cloth had, being the very first cloth of check that is noticed in our history.

‘ prove

‘ prove the equal popularity of the game among the nations of Europe,
‘ as among the tribes of Bengal; when it could carry such an extensive ‘ influence with it, upon the language of both! Ages must have been re‘ quisite, to make such an impression upon their fancies, and to throw ‘ such a colouring over their minds, as to produce this grand effect.

‘ But this is not all. The reason why such a scaccharium or chequered- ‘ cloth was preferred to all others, for the continental and insular courts of ‘ exchequer, was the use to which it had been now applied, for reckon‘ ing up by its squares the large sums to be received into those ex‘ chequers: and, as this throws the origin of chequered cloths still far‘ ther back, so was it that use of the cloth which lent the appellation of ‘ it to the court. We thus run up ages beyond the Conquest, for the in‘ troduction of chess among our continental neighbours and ourselves.

‘ We see, indeed, their language and our own, stained very deeply with ‘ the hue and die of this game. The scacchia and scaccharium, with ‘ which chess and its board came among us at first, have formed the ‘ denomination of one of our highest courts, in Latin scaccharium, in ‘ Norman French es-chequir, in English exchequer, and provincially ‘ cheqaer: have created a name for a most useful species of cloth manu‘ factured by us, chequer or check; have diffused their own appellation ‘ of chequer, over every object that is diversified in squares; and have ‘ even given the signs and the titles of chequer, to our inns*. Mr. Barrington

* Wharton's Anglia Sacra, i. 143, from the obituary of Canterbury, shews, that prior Chillenden about A. D. 1400, “ in civitate Cantuariæ unum hospitium famosum, vocatum “ Le Cheker,—nobilitèr ædificavit.” It was in Mercery Lane. “ Great part of this lane,” says Gostling, 57, “ seems formerly to have been built for large inns; great part of the “ Chequer, where Chaucer and his fellow pilgrims are said to have lodged, takes up almost “ half the west side of it.” This is called by Ieland, in Itin. viii. 6, “ the Eschequer, the face “ yene yn the High Strete of Cantorbyri.” Its front was narrow to the High Street, as it even appears in Gostling's own map, and its length extended down Mercery Lane. We even observe, that the bursary of our cathedrals, as the room is denominated in our colleges at Oxford, within which the accounts of receipts and disbursements are made up; was, and perhaps is, denominated an exchequer occasionally. So “ Thomas Bekington made the west “ ende of the cloyster” at Wells, “ with the volte,—and an eschequer over it, having 25 wyne“ doves

' rington indeed hath surmised, that these titles and these signs may ' have been derived from the use of a chequer-cloth within, for changing
 ' the reckoning to the customers. But [to suppose] that the mode of ' computing the large receipts of a royal treasury could ever have been ' adopted for the petty expenditure of an inn, is too much in that high
 ' tone of burlesque with which we have charged another surmise of his
 ' before. The supposition looks too like the hardy energy of a mind, ' which will strain and strain to wrest any thing out of its course, in ' order to serve an hypothesis. The name of Chequer to some of our ' capital inns, is explained by the appearance of a chequer upon the walls
 ' of many of our alehouses at present. Nor could the sign have ever ' been put without, but to indicate what was within, a chess-board
 ' ready for any that chose to play; just as a bunch of grapes now proclaims,
 ' that wine may be had there. Nor is the sign of the chequer merely
 ' English; it is Roman, and of the first antiquity in the empire of Rome.
 ' We have long observed this in the ruins of Pompeii, as delineated by ' the pencil of sir William Hamilton. But Mr. Barrington is the first
 ' who has publicly noticed it. The streets of Pompeii are laid out ex' actly as the streets of London are and were a few years ago; paved
 ' with great rounding-stones, and laid with a raised foot-path on each ' side. On the left-hand of the principal street are two chequers still ' remaining, fresh and entire upon the wall, not far from each other;
 ' one consisting of five lines of squares, the other of eight, and each con' taining four squares in a line, all interchangeably white and black*.
 ' And, as this fact evinces chequers to have been the signs of inns, even ' in the year 79 of our era, when Pompeii was covered with ashes from
 ' Vesuvius; so does it proclaim with a loud voice, that chess-boards were ' kept there in this year, and consequently carries the origin of chess in ' Europe to the first age of the empire†. "It

"doves toward the area side." (Leland's Itin. iii. 122.) So likewise within the close at Lincoln, "the eskeker" and "the eskeker gate." (Itin. viii. 4, 5.) So, at Durham, one who became bishop in 1437, "scaccarium coram portis castri Dunelmensis—construxit,
 "in quo curia cancellariæ skakaria—tenetur." (Wharton, i. 777.)

* 'Archæologia, iv. 170, plate.'

† Nero evidently played at chess, "cum inter initia imperii elurneis quadrigis," ivory chess-men

“It is possible, however,” adds Mr. Barrington, “that chess might be known in England, in the next century after the first crusade had taken chess-men stamped with such carriages, “quotidie in obaco luderet.” (Suetonius, 22.) This passage confirms the reasoning in the text, about chess and chess-boards at Rome, as early as 79. It also fixes the meaning of two passages in Martial, which have hitherto been considered as dubious in their design;

Sic vincas Noviumque Publumque, Mandræ et vitæ latrone clausus (vii. 71),

the chess-men here meant being of glass, the “mandræ” being the squares, and the two specified persons the Philidors of Rome at the time;

Insidiosorum si ludis bella latronum, Gemma iste tibi miles et hostis erit (xiv. 20),

the glass being cut in the form of a jewel. All is confirmed by a short passage in Ovid;

Sive latrocinii sub imagine calculus ibit,
Fac pereat vitreo miles ab hoste tuus;

the first chess-men being merely pebbles, and the name still adhering when the materials were ivory or glass. And all enables us to appropriate to chess those reputed lines of Lucan, which, as Mr. Barrington owns, “must be allowed to contain stronger allusions to what may be deemed chess, than any of the other passages,” and which therefore no mere circumstance of omitting to notice the king, as Mr. Barrington would willingly allege against his own acknowledgment, can ever wrest away from chess.

Te si forte juvat studiorum pondere fessum
Non languere tamen, lususque movere per artem;
Callidior modo, tabulâ variatur aperta
Calculus, et vitreo peraguntur milite bella,
Ut niveus niger, nunc et niger alliget albos.
Sed tibi quis non terga dedit, quis te duce cessit
Calculus, aut quis non periturus perdidit hostem?
Mille modis acies tua dimicet, ille petentem
Dum fugit, ipse rapit, longo venit ille recessu
Qui stetit in speculis, hic se committere rixæ
Audet, et in prædam venientem decipit hostem.
Ancipites subit ille moras, similisque ligato
Obligat ille duos, hic ad majora movetur,
Ut citus et fractâ prorumpat in agmina mandrâ.
Interea sectis quamvis acerrima surgunt
Prælia militibus, plenâ tamen ipse phalange,
Aut etiam pauci spoliatâ milite vincis;
Et tibi captivâ resonat manus utraque turbâ.

“ taken place; but, I should rather suppose, during the 13th century, “ upon the return of Edward the First from the Holy Land, where he “ continued

But, having gone thus far with success, I may even venture to appropriate that very passage in Ovid, of which Mr. Barrington has so emphatically pronounced, “ that no person, who is “ acquainted with the moves even at chess, can read it with attention, and conceive that it is “ alluded to.” The reasons assigned for this assertion, on a dissection of the lines, are these : that “ the second line, which makes it necessary for two pieces being employed in taking one, “ is not applicable to chess ;” that, by the seventh and eighth lines, “ the squares or divisions “ were but 12 ;” and that, “ by the ninth, the number of the pieces were [was] only 6, “ instead of 32.” The first only shews some variation from our own in the mode of playing ; just such as appears in Lucan’s lines before, when he says, and nearly such as Mr. Barrington has already conceded to be in his reputed parent of all ; when he says the “ Chinese,” though “ inventors,—have some additional pieces, which “ differ from ours both in their form and powers.” His second and third object, that the number of squares is merely 12, and of pieces only 6 ; when he previously acknowledges what he owns to be chess, and actually calls “ arch-chess,” to have “ 100 squares” in Italy (p. 17) ; and when very contradictorily he alleges in the page immediately following, that the game of Ithaca “ differs most materially from chess, as the pieces were in number 108, “ instead of 32,” and the squares therefore still more. Mr. Barrington shifts his reasoning with his convenience ; but the fact plainly is, that the “ squares” or the “ pieces,” which must always have borne a proportion to each other, only the squares more in number than the pieces, were sometimes more and sometimes less in themselves. At Rome the “ squares” were frequently twelve, but rose, at times, into sixteen, and occasionally mounted up to thirty-two, as they have since risen in Italy to 100, and had once mounted in Ithaca beyond 108. That they were twelve, frequently, in the first age of the empire, is shewn by this additional evidence in Martial :

. similisque ligato
 Obligat ille duos;

Tabula Lusoria.

Hic mihi bis seno numeratur tessera puncto
Calculus hic gemino discolor hoste perit. (xiv. 17.)

But, in the only two chequers painted on the walls of Pompeii, we see the variation more striking : one differing from the other in the number of squares, and this having sixteen, while that has thirty-two. The passage in Ovid then, thus vindicated, gives us the general but contracted chess of the times.

Cautaque non stultè latronum prælia ludat,
 Unus cum gemino calculus hoste perit;
 Bellatorque suo pressus sine compare bellat
 Æmulus, et cæptum sæpe recurrit iter ;

Reticuloque

“ continued so long, and was attended by so many English. The “ Turks, who never change their habits, are still great players at this “ game, which suits so well, both with their sedentary disposition and “ love of taciturnity.” We have seen a Turkish general playing the ‘ game so early as 1096, in the sight of an European in Palestine*, and ‘ during the first crusade; the European, even then, understanding the ‘ game and its appellation; and an historian of Britain, only about ‘ twenty years afterwards†, reciting the anecdote without wonder at
 ‘ the game, and without hesitation concerning the appellation. We ‘ have even seen the appellation of the chess-board, communicated pre‘ viously to cloths formed in assimilation to it, and transferred even
 ‘ to a high court among us. And we have actually beheld the repre‘ sentation of the chess-board, impressed upon the walls of our inns for ‘ ages in England, and still preserved upon the walls of Pompeii. In ‘ such circumstances, to talk about the introduction of chess into Eng‘ land during the thirteenth century, appears wildly ridiculous. We ‘ believe the Romans introduced chess, as they introduced all the arts ‘ and amusements of their empire, into this island.

“ The first mention which I have met with, of chess being known in “ England, is in a manuscript of Simon Aylward, said by Hyde to be “ in the library of Magdalen college‡. The same learned writer

*Reticuloque pilæ^a læves^b funduntur aperto,
 Nec nisi quam tolles ulla movenda pila est.
 Est genus in totidem tenui ratione redactum^c Scriptula, quot menses lubricus annus habet.
 Parva tabella capit ternos utrinque lapillos,
 In quâ vicisse est continuasse suos.*

But let me crown all with an anecdote concerning the emperor Proculus, yet long before he became emperor: “ quum in quôdam convivio ad latrunculos luderetur, atque ipse decies “ imperator exisset, quidam non ignobilis scurra ave, inquit, Auguste.” (Hist. Aug. 967. Lug. Bat. 1661.)

* A mistake in the reviewer, for Syria.

† Malmesbury, f. 98.

‡ Authors, very much earlier, are cited in iii. 3, before.

^a As nearly globular.

^b As cut glass.

^c As contracted chess.

“ cites another manuscript, and of Lydgate, where are the following “ lines,

“ Was of a fers so fortunate,

“ Into a corner drive and maat;

“ which are very intelligible, if we suppose that the preceding line relates “ to the piece called the king; and they will have the following mean“ ing, viz. ‘ the king was by a fortunate queen (of the adversary) “ driven into a corner of the chess-board, and check-mated,’ which of “ course concludes the game.” And, as a note adds, “ fers” [or, as Mr.
“ Barrington gives us the word, in p. 36, pherz] “ is said to signify in the “ Persian language, general, or minister, and is applied to that piece at “ chess which we term the queen.” It appears very unlucky for Mr.
“ Barrington, that he had never met with that strong ray of light, which “ darts from the page of Malmesbury before; and that he dashed from “ his hand the torch, which Hyde seems to have put into it, from the “ establishment of an exchequer. We therefore see him, like Elymas in “ the cartoon of Raphael, reaching out his hands in the dark, and feel“ ing for some kind leader; while we are looking on, with equal “ surprise and sorrow. But we here see a term in chess-playing, that “ was formerly popular in it, and is supposed to be Persian. This ac“ cordingly serves strongly to mark the Persian derivation of the game, “ mediately or immediately, to our English fathers. But we think the “ term proves still more. Fers or Pherz we consider as the same with “ Persia itself; the native appellation of the country being Pars and “ Phars, formed by the Greeks and Romans into Persis and Persia.
“ The queen then retaining the name of Persia, so late as the days of “ Lydgate in England; we have a double evidence of the Persian origin “ of the game.

“ But let us here observe again some terms, that have diffused them“ selves through our language. We have already noted some, that were “ only collateral. We wish now to remark others, that are in the direct “ line of descent. Scacchia forms in French eehec, one of the pieces is “ said to be checked or check-mated, and the whole family of checks, as “ signifying stops or controls, is derived from the game of chess. So “ very

‘ called a tawl-bwrdd among the furniture of a nobleman’s house †.
 ‘ This, says the Englishman, is “ mensa lusoria similis abaco qui in ‘ ludo scacchiæ usurpatur.—Latrunculis ex utrâque parte usos fuisse
 ‘ lusores constat, ut ad scacchiæ ludum proximè accedere videtur.—
 ‘ Crediderim quidem ludum quem nos Anglicè vocamus back-gammon
 ‘ hic designari, ni latrunculorum numerus obstiterit ; hujusce enim lusûs
 ‘ nomen est purum putum Wallicum, cammon prælium, bach parvum, ‘ quasi præliolum. A Wallis igitur ad nos hunc ludum provenisse, est ‘ verisimillimum †.” The number of pieces, then, preventing us from ‘ considering this as a back-gammon table, and the pieces and the board ‘ uniting to carry a strong resemblance to chess; we may naturally ‘ ascribe the board and the pieces to the latter. The very name too ‘ shews the game not to be back-gammon, and concurs to refer it to ‘ chess; tawl-bwrdd signifying the silent, the quiet board, from tawel, ‘ silent, quiet, taweluch, silence, quietness, taw, silent, tawedog, silent;
 ‘ and so importing the chess-board, in direct contradiction to the rattling
 ‘ table of back-gammon. But the Irish have even a more decisive ‘ appellative for chess. This is feoirna; a term, that, like the fers of ‘ Lydgate, looks strongly to Persia for the parent of the game. And in ‘ that part of the Irish, which is spoken within the western Highlands,
 ‘ and called the Erse, are these denominations for chess, bord-sheiss, a ‘ chess-board, cluich ur sheiss, a game at chess, both borrowed (we ‘ suppose) from their neighbours the English; and one purely native
 ‘ and indigenous, fear feoirna, a chess-man. So thoroughly unhappy ‘ is Mr. Barrington, to the last *!

‘ On † Wotton’s Howel Dha, p. 270.

† P. 583.

* To increase this unhappiness in the text, let me subjoin one remark in a note. The Irish have “BRANNUMH, chess, a game played upon a square board, divided into sixty-four small chequers; on each side there are eight men and as many pawns, to be moved and shifted according to certain rules. An fitchell acus ou brannamh bán (old parchment) properly means the men; gon a bhrannailh dead with his ivory men, because made of elephant’s teeth,” like the “eburnæ” of Suetonius before. “This was a favourite game with the old Irish. Lat. scaccharum ludus.” (Irish-English Dictionary, 1768, Paris, anonyms, but said by Mr. O’Halloran, in his Introduction to the History and Antiquities of Ireland, 65, to be written by Dr. John O’Brien, titular bishop of Clôyne, and praised by

‘ On the whole then, we think chess to have been a Persian invention,
 ‘ as Hyde alleges, and not a Chinese one, as Mr. Barrington surmises;
 ‘ that from Persia it went out, with the love of amusement, to Thibet, ‘ Indostan, Bengal, and China, upon one side, and the west of Europe
 ‘ on the other; that in Indostan it received little alteration, in China ‘ received some additions, and at Ithaca in Greece, particularly, suffered ‘ [at once an addition and] a diminution, [an addition in number of ‘ pieces, but a diminution in] the second piece of the game, the queen
 ‘ being made supreme, in the room of the deposed king; that in the rest ‘ of Greece probably, and all over the Roman dominions, the king was ‘ restored to his rights, and the British chess is now nearly similar to the ‘ chess of Indostan; that the queen, however, retained as late as the ‘ days of Lydgate in England; the name which marked the family-descent
 ‘ of all; that the Romans, from their chess-boards drawn upon the ‘ walls of Pompeii, on or before the year 79, so exactly similar to what ‘ are represented upon the walls of our alehouses, and reflected in the ‘ titles of our inns, at present, appear to have been the introducers of ‘ chess among us; and that, from the Britons of the Roman empire, ‘ chess had migrated with its name of relation to Persia, among the ‘ neighbouring Picts and Hibernii, and still continues stamped with its ‘ name of relation, on the common language of the western Highlands ‘ and Ireland †.

‘ Having spent so much time in stating what we think to be the true ‘ origin of chess, we can only notice in the most cursory manner a few ‘ more of Mr. Barrington’s remarks. He refers, in p. 32, to Carte, i.

by Mr. O’Halloran much, in 109, &c.) So “ Fitchill (I.) is tables or chess-board, Ag “ imirt fitchille (I.), playing at tables or chess.” And, what shews the nature of the instruments with which the game was played, Dead (I.), “ a tooth—sometimes—implies “ ivory,” as an elephant’s tooth, and sometimes (as above) a chess-man. With such a temerity of mind did Mr. Barrington presume to doubt of “ the Irish having any term in “ their language for the game.” They had, it is plain from various signatures in their language, the game very familiar among them.

† The Highlanders retain the name of chess, while the Irish call it brannumh from those chess-men, which the Irish call brannaibh, and the Highlanders brannumh, at this day.

‘ 445, for a quarrel at chess between the eldest son of Philip king of France, and Henry the Second, son of William the Conqueror, in 1087* ; and answers it only—by “wishing, Carte had stated the term used in the Norman Chronicle to which he refers.” A poor reply surely, and unworthy of Mr. Barrington! “Hyde,” he says also, in p. 36, —mentions a set of chess-men preserved at St. Denys, which belonged to Charlemagne, and four of which were kings and queens.” But how does he evade this strong allegation against him? “That these pieces cannot be so ancient,” he replies, “seems to be sufficiently evident, both from the set being preserved entire for near ten centuries, and from the principal pieces having Arabic characters on their back, with the name of the maker. If Charlemagne was a player at chess, he would have probably employed an artist of his own dominions.” A reply still more poor in itself, and more unworthy of Mr. Barrington, than the former! “In Muscovy,” he adds†, “it is said to be in great vogue among the shop-keepers—. Chess moreover is supposed to be alluded to in some verses, which are inserted in the ancient northern poems of Hervarar Saga; but the passage alluded to may relate to other games, which are played upon a chequered board.” Non persuadebis, etiamsi persuaseris. “Hyde indeed informs us, that it is not unknown even in Iceland.” A note adds: “I am informed by Mr. professor Thorkelin, who is by birth an Iceland, that chess (called shak) continues to be an amusement in that island, and [to be played] by abler players than are to be found in Copenhagen.” The Romans diffused the game of chess, under its Persian appellation of scacchia, over all their empire; and even propagated it beyond the bounds of their empire, under the same appellation. Thus even the most distant and insulated Icelanders still retain it, under its Roman title of scacchia, or shak. But the game itself being deduced to the Romans from the Persians, the king (or president of the whole game) was naturally named, as “this piece is” actually “termed—in the more eastern parts of Asia, shach or emperor‡,” shaw or king, and

* A mistake in the reviewer, for “Henry I.” in the author; and gravely corrected by the reviewer in a note, as the author’s.

† P. 34.

‡ P. 35.

‘ so conferred (we apprehend) the original name of σκακίη, scacchia, upon the whole game. And we may just subjoin from Mr. Barrington, in order to reduce all he says into a perfect conformity with this new hypothesis of ours, that “ the term of gambet at chess, which hath been introduced (it is believed) into most European languages, is clearly of Italian original” (p. 25); that what “ we call sometimes the rook but more commonly the castle, I conceive—to be derived from the Italians,—as rocca in that language not only signifies a rook but a fortress” (p. 37); that “ the term of being mated seems also to be derived from the Italian amazzato; or killed,” when it plainly is nothing more than the old English mated or subdued, and check-mated or subdued by a check *; that what “ we call the bishop, and—the French call the fou, or fool, because anciently royal personages were commonly—attended” as closely by their fool, as the king and queen are by this piece, and which, “ in Caxton’s time, was styled the elphyn,” seems therefore to have been named the bishop only after the Reformation,” and, “ in the chess-pieces which belonged to Charles I.” this piece has a top “ somewhat resembling a bishop’s mitre” (p. 37 and 38); that the “ term of pawn is probably taken from the Spanish word peon, which signifies a foot-soldier” (p. 33), though “ the pawns in Caxton’s time were of different figures, and not all uniform, as at present,” while “ the pawn before the queen (for example) represents the queen’s spicer or apothecary, see Caxton’s book on chess” (p. 38) †; and that chess—continued to be the favourite game throughout Europe till it was dropt for cards, not by their superiority surely, but because inferior players at other games

* Rather, as the ever-instructive Skinner derives it in check, from the Italian “ scacco matto,” a piece subdued at chess; both words, and the French mat or matée, check-mated or subdued, being the old Latin mattus, subdued, which Salmasius finds in one of Cicero’s epistles to Atticus, xvi. 12. (Notes on Hist. Aug. 967, 968.)

† This may with much greater propriety be derived with rook and gambet and mated, from the language of that Italy, which through France gave us chess at first. “ A pawn at chess,” says Skinner, “ a Fr. G. [Franco-Gallica] pion, It. pedina, pedone,” laxly, “ latrunculus,” a chess-man, but in strictness a foot-soldier.

‘ had a better chance of winning’ (p. 26), because, as king James ‘ judiciously says, not “ in his Ενωρ Βασιλευς,” as Mr. Barrington affirms, ‘ but in his Δωρ Βασιλευς, as the fact really is, chess “ is over-wise” ‘ (p. 31). has too little of the relaxation of amusement in it, and exposes ‘ a man too much to the unknown strength of his antagonist’s sagacity, ‘ and because, as Mr. Barrington himself infers, “ it being impossible to ‘ know the full force of your antagonist, no one would play at chess for “ money” any more (p. 26).

‘ We trust the readers of our Review will thank us, for this long dis- ‘ section of Mr. Barrington’s paper, and for the original matter which we ‘ have introduced into it. And, if Mr. Barrington be the man that we ‘ take him to be, he will be the first to thank us.’

SOME NEW REMARKS.

“ SIR William Jones has informed us,” says Francis Douce, esq. in a set dissertation on the origin of chess; “ that chess was invented by the “ HINDOOS; from the testimony of the Persians, who unanimously agree, “ that it was imported from the west of India, in the SIXTH century *.” This daring declaration is repelled at once, by the historical proofs before; and must appear therefore to every critical reader, in the energetical but colloquial language of Johnson, the more energetical by being colloquial, a mere throwing of peas against a rock. The chess-board was known even at Rome itself, as we have seen before, in the very FIRST century. Nor is there any possibility of pretending, in order to cover this glare of error; that the sixth century of the author, or of sir William Jones, means one of an epocha different from the common, the æra of the Seleucidæ, the æra of Nabonassar, or the æra of the Mahometans. Both these writers do plainly refer by their manner to the common epocha; and Mr. Douce particularly confirms the suggestion, by what he alleges from sir William a few lines below, by speaking of “ the Arabs, who soon after took possession of their [the Persians] “ country †.”

* Archæ. xi. 397.

† P. 398.

Mr. Douce equally remarks from the original architect of this falsely bearing fabric, what almost equally undermines all which he attempts to erect; that “no account of the game has hitherto been discovered in the classical writings of the bramins, though it is confidently asserted that Shanscrit books on chess exist ‡.” The confidence imposed upon both these gentlemen, even when the non-appearance should have cured their credulity. Just so the unanimous testimony of the Persians before, seduced them into a belief directly opposed by the facts of history. And a false gem of paste is worshipped by these worse than Indians, in preference to the sun bursting forth from the gates of the East.

But I must notice more at large some points in Mr. Douce’s essay, that illustrate the names of the pieces at chess, and actually (without the author’s perception of the result) subvert again the very hypothesis which he has been framing with sir William. After such an egregious stumble, as we have seen this author making at the very first step, it certainly is not necessary for my argument to attend his movements any longer. But it is very useful. And I shall be able, I trust, to shew his various rays of intelligence diverging widely from his own focus, to improve some of them, and then collect them with new rays into the true focus of all.

“The principal piece,—by all the writers who have mentioned the “game,—is uniformly styled the KING §.” At Ithaca, however, Homer says it was called Penelope.

“With respect to the piece next in rank, and now (I believe) universally called the QUEEN,—it is certain that the French, and after them the English, during the middle ages, adopted a very different name:” Fierce in Roman de Cassamus MS. Fierces in Roman de la Rose MS. Feers in Chaucer’s Dream of Love ||. “The term is borrowed from the “Eastern word Pherz,” notes our author in consonance with Mr. Barrington, “which means a counsellor or general ¶.” Yet how then

‡ Archæ. xi. 398.

§ Ibid. ibid.

|| P. 399.

¶ Ibid. ibid.

comes the piece to be called a queen afterwards? As Mr. Douce conjectures, from “the similarity in sound between the words pheræ and “vierge.” This very weak conjecture Mr. Douce endeavours to strengthen from an old poem in Latin, “commonly ascribed to Ovid, “but with more probability supposed to have been written during the “middle ages, by a monk named Pamphilus Maurus*,” in which “the queen is called virgo †.” In Poland and Russia, however, he alleges himself, and so destroys his own conjecture, “it is—called the “old woman or nurse ‡.” This transition of ideas, therefore, is one that cannot possibly be marked in the mind of man; unless the symbol stamped upon the piece originally, was a Persian woman. This, and this alone, can account for the nurse, the virgin, and the queen, all in one piece.

“The BISHOP was, by the English writers before cited,” Horman in 1519, and Caxton antecedent to him, “called alphyn, awfyn, and alfin; “by the old French romancers, aufin.—The present Spanish and Italian “chess-terms, alfieres,—alfiere, or alfino,—are evidently from the same “source.—The French, at a very early period, called this piece fol—. “It is easy to trace this term from the original, fil,” said by Hyde to be “Arabic,” and “the name of this piece on the Eastern chess-board;” though it occurs not before “the beginning of the fourteenth century,” and though the previous name is very different. “It occurs in the “Roman de la Rose, and in a manuscript of the Roman du Vœu de Paon, “where it is likewise called aufin.—The French yet retain this name [that “name of fol]; and I have seen French and German chess-men, among “which this piece has occurred. I have not been able to discover when “this piece was first called an archer, or for what reason.—Dr. Hyde, in “his description of what are usually called Charlemagne’s chess-men, in “the treasury of St. Dennis, makes it to be an archer—.” In the poem also cited before, as ascribed to Ovid, the elphin is called the bishop expressly,

. Alpinus episcopus ipse est.

Accordingly “the Poles” call it “the priest,” and “in a very old Latin

* Archæ. xi. 404.

† P. 400.

‡ P. 399.

“ poem

“poem upon chess, printed by Dr. Hyde from a manuscript in the “Bodleian library, the piece next the king,” or next but one, as it should have been called, “is termed calvus, and” so “denotes a monk,” or a secular clergyman, “with a shaven crown.” All this variety of names has resulted assuredly from the only incident that can account for such a variety, a similarity in the symbols on the piece to a mitre, and a bow. “The English and Danes alone, in modern times, called “it the bishop; and the first mention of this term that I have met with “in England, is in Saul’s Famous Game of Chesse-play, originally “published in 1640; who says—the bishop” is “representing the “clergy ‘with high cloven heads like a bishop’s miter*’.” The mitre made the bishop, the priest, and the calvus. The mitré then, was always there. Yet how could it come thither, if the piece was either Indian or Persian? It came from the use of a mitre among the priests of Persia, confined to the high-priest assuredly in the present form, but common to all the priests in this or in another†; a fact that carries a high antiquity with it for the mitre, as I have previously remarked, because a figure appears to this day with a mitre on its head, upon the rocks near Persepolis‡; and a circumstance, in the fact, that accounts satisfactorily for the present denomination of the piece, sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a bishop, the old ideas prevailing equally with the new upon the mind. At the tomb of the kings still nearer to Persepolis, appears equally in the front of the rock above, “an altar with fire burning on it; and,” what wonderfully accounts for the equal appellation of archer with bishop for the piece, “a reverend person holding a bow in “his hand§.” This occurs in two places, the bow being rested at one end upon the ground, and having the left hand of the priest laid upon the other, while the right is protended in prayer to the fire||. In this form, the idolatrous priest and his idol fire were naturally execrated by the zeal of the Christians, and denominated elfyn or the demons; ælfenne being the plural of the Saxon elf, the Teutonic alp, or the Belgic alf, signifying some lesser deities of German demonology, and passing

* Archæ. xi. 400, 405.

† See iii. 2, before.

‡ Ibid. ibid.

§ Ant. Univ. History, v. 115.

|| Ibid. plates 31, 32.

with the Lombards of Germany (I apprehend) into Italy. But others again acted in the same contracted attention to parts, which called out the bow and the mitre into separate discriminations for the piece, yet with an indistinctness of vision, that formed the bow into a proboscis, and changed the peaks of the mitre into two ears erected; as “the Germans call this piece the hound or runner, the Russians and Swedes “the elephant ♖.” Nor is the name of fol, which the French have latterly given to the piece, referrible to any other principle, than that popular association of ideas which has pervaded all Christendom; of the elves or fairies stealing children peculiarly brisk from their cradles, and substituting others peculiarly dull in their place. Hence “esprit follet,” signifies an elf now with the French, “un follet,” a hobgoblin; as a changeling means an idiot, and auf, or ouf, a stupid man, among ourselves, though that is primarily a fairy-child exchanged, and this is actually an alf or elf.

“The KNIGHT has been always so called upon the French and English “chess-boards. It is probable, that he was represented in the earliest “times as mounted upon his charger. Vida has so described this piece; “and hence, in modern times, it has been simply termed the horse, and “so represented. The Spaniards and Italians have adopted both those “names” of horse and knight, “but give it the form of a horse’s head. “With us it is—represented as a horse’s head.” This account throws a strong light back upon the immediately preceding, and shews how the bow or the mitre came to be severally the discriminations of the piece; even by being severally stamped upon it. In this disposition alone, could the bow have been taken for a proboscis, and the two peaks of the mitre considered as two erected ears of a hound. “These pieces—, “among Charlemagne’s men,—have been converted into centaurs,” that is, are represented, with some dimness, as men on horseback. “The “Germans, from the nature of their motion on the board,” or rather from their aspect as horses, “call them leapers; among the Poles and “Danes they are termed knights, and among the Russians horses *.”

¶ Archæ. xi. 404.

* P. 405, 406.

This instance serves strikingly to shew us, how little we can expect to find original appellations adhering to the pieces at present, how much the present appellations are derived from the aspect of the pieces, but how some nations have taken only one half of the aspect, while others have taken the halves both together.

“The origin of our rook is certainly to be sought for in the old French term roc,—but” this “was immediately borrowed, together with the Spanish and Italian terms, from ruc, the Eastern name of this piece.—But a difficulty arises in ascertaining, whether the most ancient Eastern ruc was represented as a dromedary—. Mons. D’Herbelot informs us, that rokh, in the Persian language, signifies a valiant hero seeking after military adventures; in which character, he says, it was introduced into the game of chess.—But it is needless to prosecute this inquiry any farther, after sir William Jones has informed us, that the rook is to be deduced from rot’h of the old Hindoo game of chess, which was an armed chariot*.” The very contradictoriness of this derivation from the East, precludes all possibility of belief in it. The rashness also, in asserting “ruc” to be “the Eastern name of this piece,” when the name afterwards proves to be “rot’h,” a very different one, doubly precludes all possibility. Yet we need not dwell upon this rashness, or that contradictoriness, as Mr. Douce immediately sweeps both away, with an unwary hand. “I conceive,” he proceeds to add†, unconscious of his own deviation from himself, “that our term castle, as applied to this piece, is of a very modern date, and that, with the French tour, it originated from its shape,” not as an armed chariot, which in all consistency it ought to be, but as a tower or castle. “It is so represented in the early Italian dissertations on the game, although uniformly called il roccho.” The author meant surely to have written, and therefore is uniformly called il roccho. The argument certainly requires the change. But the author is much confused here in his movements, and so turns again upon his own course, in the words immediately following. “Some careless writers confounding this term,

* Archæ. xi. 406, 407.

† P. 407, 408.

“which

“ which is evidently from the same source as the old French roc, with “ rocca, a fortress; have increased the mistake by tracing a supposed “ connexion between a castle and a fortress; which has given rise to a “ multitude of conjectures.” What a mass of confusion have we here before us! Let me unravel it a little. He here intimates again the roccho of the Italians and the roc of the French, to be derived from his ruc, alias rot’h, an armed chariot; when he has just before informed us, that this rook “ is—represented” as a castle “ in the early Italian “ dissertations,” and that the name of castle, he “ conceives,— “ originated from its shape.” But contradictoriness always attends upon confusedness. Yet who are the “ careless writers,” that have “ con- “ founded” this term of roccho with “ rocca, a fortress?” Even they, it seems, who “ have increased the mistake, by tracing a supposed con- “ nexion, between” two objects so very nearly connected in reality, as “ a castle and a fortress.” Confusion perhaps did never do her own work before with a completer satisfaction in the labour of her hands. Yet she has still greater satisfaction. “ It is probable,” adds the author, “ that the European form of the castle,” which he has previously stated only as mere Italian, “ was copied in part from some ancient Indian “ piece,” what in conformity to its name ought to have had an armed chariot, but what this very forgetful author now believes, and with reason, to have been charged “ with the elephant and castle on his back. “ It is thus described by Vida; and whilst the French, Spaniards, Eng- “ lish, and Italians,” the three first from the last, “ have retained the “ tower only,” so calling it rocco or fortress, “ the Danes and Germans “ have adopted the elephant without the castle, by the former of which “ names it is also called by them.—By the Poles this piece is also termed “ the rook— Among Charlemagne’s pieces, it is termed the elephant.” This adoption of separate parts in the representation as a denomination for the whole unites with the same sort of adoption in the bishop, to shew the familiarity of the practice in all these terms for chess-men. The rook then had upon it originally a tower-backed elephant, and afterwards a tower separately, or an elephant by itself, as Mr. Douce has properly conjectured at last; though before he “ conceives—our “ term castle—is of a very modern date,” yet allows it is so represented “ in

“in the early Italian dissertations,” even conceives the name to have “originated from its shape,” and now conjectures this shape to have been “borrowed in part from some ancient Indian piece;” a very modern name being derived from an early representation, even from an ancient and original one. But setting aside all these contradictions by picking the single truth out of them all, the name is plainly derived, not from any imaginary rac of the East, which perhaps is, and perhaps is not a dromedary, not from the real rokh of the Persians, which is said to be a hero, and not from the real rot’h of the Indians, which is equally said to be an armed chariot, but from the rocca or rocco of the Italians, a name actually descriptive of one of the two objects in the representation upon it, used by some nations in its nearly Italian form, as rook, and used by others under a translation into tower or castle.

“It remains,” as Mr. Douce subjoins*, “only to notice the PAWNS. “These appear to have been always so called among ourselves, and by “the French in the middle ages paon,—poons,—and pionnes:—they “are—probably from pedones, a barbarous Latin term for foot-soldiers.— “By the Italians they are called pedone, by the Spaniards’ peones: the “Russians and Poles make them also foot-soldiers†.” The name, therefore, flows from the Italian, and the stream has come coloured through France into Britain; the Italian pedone softening into peon, poon, or paen.

All attempts, then, to deduce the appellations of the pieces in chess from the language of India, prove impotent and ridiculous in the result; they are all but one confessed by the very attempters themselves to be Italian: even that one appears now to be more evidently Italian than any of the others. All, therefore, unite in their testimony against that very hypothesis of an Indian origin, in favour of which they were produced by Mr. Douce: one of them apparently carries the very name of Persia on its head, and another as apparently had the very symbols of Persia once upon it. Even Mr. Douce himself unites unconsciously with his leader, sir William Jones, by deriving one of the names from the Indian rot'h, as mispronounced into rokh by the Persians, and as so giving birth to the Italian roccho, the French roc, with the English rook, to make Persia, not India, the parent of the game to Europe. Italy thus appears, in direct contradiction to the hypothesis of both, but in full accordance with the voice of history, to have been the transmitter of the Persian game to the western nations of Europe, at a time when Italy was the mistress of Europe, and when only she could form the chain connecting western Europe with Persia.

* Archæ. xi. 408, 409.

† P. 408, 409.

No. II.

CONCERNING THE ORIGIN OF FREE MASONS.

IN the body of the work I have sufficiently refuted the origin assigned to these masons by an ingenious essay in the Archæologia *. But another essay here arises before me, and with a louder voice demands its reprobation at my hand; this is a tract “said to be printed at Franckfort in Germany, 1748,” under a German title, but wholly English in all the rest. If the first essay takes a flight upwards, to the hazard of its author’s neck, the second mounts into the clouds at once, and hardly ever comes within sight of earth again: to expose this, therefore, as I have exposed that, is necessary for giving a full completeness to my reasoning before.

Subjoined to the life of Leland is this tract, consisting of a text and notes †. The text professes to be a set of questions and answers concerning masonry; questions supposed to be put in privy council, and answers returned by some free masons, but both “wryttenne by the hande of kynge Henrye the Sixthe of the name.” The text will thus be acknowledged to carry an historical authority with it, if the hand-writing of Henry be ascertained; yet, till it is, we see an apparent absurdity in the process alleged, the king himself playing the humble part of a clerk in council, as taking down the questions and the answers with his own hand.

How then is the hand-writing ascertained? By attestation only: the original is lost, a copy alone remains. Yet how is the original attested to have ever existed, and how is the copy attested to be a just transcript

* See ii. 3.

† P. 96, 103.

of it? The same title to the text which avers it to be written by the sixth Henry, equally avers it to be “faythfullye copyed by me, Johan “Leylande, antiquarius, by the commaunde of his highnesse” the eighth Henry. This attestation undoubtedly is sufficient for every purpose of authentication, if it is authenticated itself; but, alas! it is not; Leland’s attestation is equally non-apparent with Henry’s hand-writing: the whole, indeed, is here said to be “a MS. in the Bodleian library ‡.” Yet where in the Bodleian it is, is not said; or who ever saw it there, is not noticed. Even the biographer of Leland, who wrote in Oxford and printed at the Clarendon press, who therefore was peculiarly enabled to discover, and interested to consult, the original of his own publication, was forced to content himself with leaving it to say, that, “from—“obvious—mistakes—it is evident this treatise was not printed from “Leland’s original transcript, but rather from a secondary copy of an “unlearned copyist, who only could fall into the egregious errors” of it §; with only adding himself, that “an ancient MS. of Leland’s has “long remained in the Bodleian library, unnoticed in any account of “our author yet published,” and unknown in its existence to this very writer, as he subjoins, that “if the authenticity,” and should have rather subjoined, if the very existence “of this ancient monument of “literature remains unquestioned, it demands particular notice in the “present publication ¶;” and with then publishing it from—“the Gentleman’s Magazine, September 1753 ¶.”

Yet this treatise professes to be printed from a copy direct of Leland’s, and to prefix “a letter of the famous Mr. John Locke,” under the date “of May 6, 1696,” in testimony of that. The letter is addressed “to “the Rt. Hon.  earl of *;” speaks to him of “that MS. in the “Bodleian library which you were so curious to see ;” and adds, “I “have at length, by the help of Mr. C—ns, procured a copy *.” And as Mr. Locke in this letter acknowledges himself the author of the notes to the text, so all are declared to have been found “in the desk or scri-

‡ P. 96.

§ P. 103.

¶ P. 67.

¶ P. 96.

* P. 96.

“toir of a deceased brother †.” With such a bold appeal to names, with such a confident cital of anonymous inspection and anonymous preservation, yet with so much suspectibility in its countenance, has this English text of Henry’s writing, and Leland’s copying, with these English notes and English letter by Locke, been published in Germany more than half a century after the date of Locke’s letter!

The tract, however, has imposed upon many, I believe: it has certainly imposed so far upon the biographer of Leland, that with some dubiousness he inserted it as a real transcript of Leland’s. Yet it shews the flare of forgery playing visible upon every lineament of its face, particularly in making masonry “begynne with the fyrste menne yn the “Este, whych were before the fyrste manne of the Weste,” in making the “Venetians,” for the Phenicians, bring it into the West; and in making “Peter Gower,” for the French Pythagore, or the Greek Pythagoras, “frame a grate lodge at Groton,” for Crotona, “yn Grecia “Magna,” of which some masons went to France and some to England ‡. Even if the free masons then were so ignorant, amidst all their professed knowledge of all their ancient history, from or before Adam to the days of Pythagoras, as to force Pythagoras upon a new transmigration into Peter Gower, to turn Crotona into Groton, and to modernize the Phenicians into Venetians, yet Henry would certainly not have written all their barbarisms of pronunciation in their full and uncorrected tone of ignorance; still less would Leland have copied them all, without correction, without notation, for the eighth Henry. Even if Leland could have copied, even if the sixth Henry could have written them, yet we have already seen the free masons of this very Henry’s reign to have been mere mechanics, mere handicraftsmen, mere labourers in brick and mortar; who therefore knew nothing of Crotona, knew nothing of Pythagoras, knew nothing of the Phenicians.

History and criticism thus unite to lay their iron hands in concert upon the head of this treatise, and to stamp their brand of forgery deep into the thick scull of its front. Yet for what purpose was it forged? When we examine the whole more nicely, we perceive such an air of studied extravagance: we see such an appearance of a laugh ready to break out, but stifled for the moment; we catch such symptoms of a smile, sitting upon the lips, and just opening them into a grin, as shew the whole to be fabricated on purpose to play upon the faith, and to glory over the credulity of all who give credit to it.

† P. 96.

‡ P. 98, 99.

I was therefore induced at first, from the reference of Locke to Collins, and from the timid contraction of Collins's name into C—ns by Locke, to suppose the procurer of the copy was the fabricator of the original. From the known infidelity of Collins, from the known connexion of Locke with him, I suppose Collins very capable of putting such a forgery upon Locke; and I believe Collins very likely to put it, in order to play upon and to glory over the credulity of a man who was engaged in the folly of Arianism with infidels, but refused to go on with them into the sottishness of infidelity. The connexion of Collins with Locke, the intimacy subsisting between their persons in some similarity of their principles, and the Arianism of Locke shooting up into the very infidelity of Collins, as Arianism has so sadly shot up in others*, are recorded in very mournful characters upon the face of an useful anecdote. "This person," says my religious friend and respectable intimate, the late Dr. Horne, bishop of Norwich, concerning Collins, "on his death-bed was under great anxiety; and just before he expired, with a deep sigh pronounced the following words, LOCKE HAS RUINED ME! His niece, who attended him at the time, related this circumstance to Mr. Wogan, the pious author of an Essay on the proper Lessons, as he assured a friend of mine," one to my knowledge worthy of all credit, "the Rev. Dr. Merrick, of St. Ann's, Soho†."

Yet, upon closer inspection, I believe it to be a forgery upon Collins as well as Locke; the sly air of imposition, half concealed, yet half revealed, marks equally the notes of Locke with the text of Collins, and marks

* Origin of Arianism, 497, 498.

† Jones's Life of Bishop Horne, 278.

marks the notes indeed more glaringly even than the text: it thus pervades the substance of both thoroughly, and both therefore appear the manufacture of one mind. The grand aim of both is the exaltation of masonry to the sky; nor is this exaltation the simple effusion of attachment, the result of zeal and indiscretion in a brother mason; it is merely the insidious flattery of a foe, exalting in order to depress, mounting the higher with masonry in order to give it a greater fall, and bearing it on the waxen wings of Icarus towards the sun, that there they may melt, and it tumble headlong into the deep. The wilful wildness of extravagance throughout a text that was plainly written for the notes, and the solemn soberness of extravagance throughout notes that were as plainly drawn up at the same time with the text, shew this conspicuous to the examining eye. But we see this displayed particularly in one passage, in which the text avers free masons to have taught mankind all the arts of life, even all religion likewise; and a note adds, “that—they have their own authority for it, and I know not how we shall disprove them †.” In this manner, and with this view, do we behold those who appear from their very name to be merely the modern sons of England, to be the mere “masons,” and mere “labourers” of England during the reign of Henry VI. converted in England by the wand of this roguish Mercury, assuming the person of Locke, adopting the clothes of Collins, but wearing the mask of Momus; sometimes into the philosophers of Greece, then with a designed contradictoriness into the founders of all the arts to mankind, and with a designed contradictoriness again, into the very fathers of all religion to the world. The humble trowel of our bricklayers is thus enshrined in glory over the altar, and has thus a temple erected to its honour, merely to engage the worship of the free masons, and to draw down upon them the ridicule of the world for it.

Sunt geminæ somni portæ; quarum altera fertur
 Cornea, quâ veris facilis datur exitus umbris;
 Altera, candenti perfecta nitens elephante,
 Sed falsa ad cælum mittunt insomnia manes.

† P. 100.

HIS ubi tum natum Anchises unâque Sibyllam Prosequitur dictis, portâque emittet eburnâ §.

§ To that origin of free masons in England, as mere "masons" and mere "labourers," which I have exposed in ii. 3, before, let me add their first appearance upon our records as "free" masons. We have a deed from the prior and monks of Bath, in consideration of the good services shewn, and to be shewn, "a dilecto nobis in Christo Johanne Multon "FREMASON," granting him "officium magistri omnium operum nostrorum vulgariter "nuncupatorum FREMASONRY," when it shall be vacant. This was "dat. in domo nostrâ "capitulari primodie Februarii anno regni regis Henrici Octavi—vicesimo octavo." (Warner's History of Bath, Appendix, p. 55, 1801.) No longer a mere mason, no longer ranked therefore among mere labourers, he was now distinguished with the title of free mason, and was now intrusted with the superintendency of buildings; he was intrusted even with the superintendency of large buildings, became a retained superintendant of their repairs, was retained by anticipation of death in the very lifetime of the superintendant retained before, and had a salary "quadraginta solidos" assigned him, "neenon liberatam panni ad togam," a livery of cloth for a gown, "cùm et quoties liberatam dari contigerit," whenever the other lay officers of the priory had one. We thus see the builders of Solomon's temple, the architects perhaps of the tower of Babel, for the first time appearing as free masons and as architects at all upon the records of England, the only records of their existence under the moon.

No. III.

CONCERNING A VICTORY ATTRIBUTED TO ST. GERMAN IN WALES.

IN that period of our island annals, which succeeds immediately to the departure of the Romans from us; the sun of history, which came with the Romans to enlighten us, now retiring with them again to leave us in darkness; we behold a very extraordinary victory ascribed to the relinquished Britons, and we find it denominated from its principal circumstance the Alleluiah victory. It is even noticed by Usher, as the general theme of conversation among the scholars of his time, then much more attentive than scholars now are, to the ecclesiastical or miraculous points of history; and the general subject of history among the authors of that or the preceding century, all agreeing in the belief of the incident, all endeavouring to remove the difficulties of the narrative, all trying to ascertain the precise period of the whole*. The narrative was written by one Constantius, a clergyman of Lyons in France, a cotemporary with Sidonius Apollinaris, and the very person to whom Sidonius dedicated the first eight books of his epistles†. He is even described in Sidonius's ninth, as "a man of singular seriousness, of salutary prudence, in his publications excelling other men of eloquence, whether engaged on the same subjects or on different, in the endowments of a superior rhetoric‡." In a preface to a work of the ninth century we are particularly told, that Constantius wrote the Life of Germanus, in which the Alleluiah victory is recorded, "at a time when the memory of the saint yet breathed fresh in the mouths of all, and many were yet surviving

* Usher, 179: "Illam omnium sermone atque scriptis celebratissimam, victoriam Alleluaticam." See also 180.

† Usher, 175.

‡ Usher, 175: "Ut 'virum singularis ingenti, salutis consilii, in tractatibus publicis ceteros eloquentes, seu diversa sive paria decernat, præstantioris facultatē dotibus antecellentem' prædicat, lib. 9, epist. 16."

“who saw him alive upon earth §.” Such a writer therefore, so respectable in understanding, and so near to the very time, should carry a considerable weight of authority with him. The narration of the victory comes within a very little distance from the period of it; and Bede has accordingly done Constantius the honour to transcribe that narration into his own history ||. Yet, after all, the whole narrative is merely a fiction, I think, historically incredible in its circumstances, historically false in its substance.

SECTION I.

“THE SAXONS and PICTS,” says Constantius, “engaged in war with united forces against the BRITONS, whom the same necessity had combined in a camp against them; and when the Britons, in the trepidation of their spirits, judged themselves almost unequal to the contest, they requested the aid of the holy bishops,” Germanus and Lupus, “who, hastening their promised arrival, gave as much security and confidence, as if a very great army had been believed to have joined them. Under these apostolical generals therefore, Christ warred in the camp. The venerable days of Lent were also come, which were made more religious by the presence of the priests ¶.” The Picts and the Saxons, it

§ Usher, 175, 176, cites “Sigebert Gemblacens.—in Chronic. ann. 877,” for “Erriens Autissiodorensis monachus,” who put Constantius’s Life of Germanus into verse, writing another work upon the miracles omitted in the Life of Germanus, and speaking of Constantius in his preface thus; that he wrote the Life “‘cùm per ora eunctorum sancti recens adhuc spiraret memoria, pluresque qui eum degentem in seculo viderant superessent’.”

|| Bede Hist. i. 17-20, &c.

¶ For the Life in general, see “Constant. de Vitâ Germani, lib. i. cap. 19, MS. in bibliothecâ Sarisburiensi et Cottonianâ, et apud Surium, tom. iv. Jul. 31,” Usher 170, and for this incident in particular, Usher 179: “‘Interea Saxones Pictique bellum adversus Britones junctis viribus susceperunt, quos eadem necessitas in castra contraxerat; et cùm trepidi partes suas penè impares judicarent, sanctorum antistitum auxilium petierunt. Qui, promissum maturantes adventum, tantum securitatis ac fiduciæ contulerunt; ut accessisse maximus crederetur exercitus. Itaque, apostolicis ducibus, Christus militabat in castris.
“Aderant

it seems, were united into one army against the Britons; while these opposed them indeed in the field, but kept themselves close to their camp. Even there they were apprehensive for the consequences; and therefore desired the two bishops of France, who were by accident in the country at the time, to come and join them. This was a very natural action in men, alarmed at their situation, yet Christian in their spirits. By such, the presence of two saint-like bishops might be well considered, as likely to have a peculiar efficacy in lowering their fears and in exalting their hopes, by their religious addresses to them, or their devout supplications with them. We accordingly find, that the whole army of the Britons considered the arrival of the bishops as equivalent to a second army. We even find, that, “under these apostolical generals, Christ” is said by Constantius to have actually “warred in the camp.” And we finally find, that these Britons kept “Lent” very strictly; only kept those “venerable days” in a “more religious” manner, because of “the presence of the priests.” So thoroughly was the whole country of Britain engaged at the time, in professing and in practising the Christian religion!

Yet we read immediately afterwards another account. The observance of Lent was kept with such strictness, adds Constantius, “that the Britons were instructed by preachings every day, and were eager to fly to the blessing of BAPTISM: for the greatest part of the army requested the saving waters of BAPTISM. A church is framed and wattled together with leafy boughs against the day of the Lord’s Resurrection, and in a military expedition is fitted up like a city. Washed by BAPTISM, the army marches forth*.” The Britons, we thus find to our surprise, were

“Aderant etiam Quadragesimæ venerabiles dies, quos religiosiores reddebat præsentia sacerdotum’.”

* Constantius in Usher, 179: “‘In tantum ut, quotidianis prædicationibus instituti, certatim ad gratiam baptismatis convolarent. Nam maxima exercitûs multitudo undam lavacri salutaris expetit. Ecclesia ad diem Resurrectionis Dominicæ frondibus contexta componitur, et in expeditione campestri instar civitatis aptatur. Madidus baptismate proceedit exercitus’.” Those words “‘maxima exercitûs multitudo’,” might be translated were not Christians. Those who had sent for the two bishops to come and join them; those who had exulted at their arrival, as if they had received the reinforcement of a second army; those who had “Christ” thus “warring in the camp” along with them; had not yet (we find) been instructed in the elements of the Gospel. Even those who had always kept Lent, who now kept it only more strictly than they had used to do, had not yet been admitted into the profession of Christianity. So retrograde does the history move as it proceeds! All Britain is represented as still heathenish, though it had just invited and urged two bishops out of France, not to come and convert and christianize them, but to refute some heresies that were beginning to disgrace their Christianity. An army of un-baptized Britons is described as imploring those very bishops to come into their camp, and as exulting when they came, at the vast accession of strength which they had now received. A host of heathens is thus exhibited to us as keeping Lent, as keeping it more religiously than they used to keep it, and as finally receiving baptism at Easter. So palpably contradictory is one part of the narration to another!

But to consider the narration in a more historical manner; we have here two armies in the field so early as the commencement of Lent. This was very early indeed; yet the point is plainly asserted. They were encamped before the bishops arrived; as after their arrival we are told, that “the venerable days of Lent were also come.” These the soldiers now kept, were during them “instructed by preachings every day” from the bishops, and were finally “washed by baptism” on “the day of the Lord’s Resurrection.” Thus an army, which cannot now take the field even on the southern shore of Britain, before the beginning of May, could then take it in the very north of Wales (for such the scene of action will immediately appear to be fixed by Usher), in the end of February or before. So much is the supposed fate of Italy as to warmth, reversed in Britain; and so much colder than it was, is Britain grown at present! But the author of the narrative was a Frenchman, an inhabitant too in the south of France; and in the midst of those inventions, with which he thought it right to embellish the history of Germanus, he forgot the difference of latitude between the countries in which and of which he wrote, and betrayed his fiction by his folly.

“the very great mass of the army;” but are confined to the sense in which I have translated them, by these words occurring soon, “‘pars major exercitûs,’” for the very same object.

This was the only army too which the Roman provinces of Britain could furnish at the time. The commander of it thought himself unequal to a contest with the enemy; yet did not send for fresh succours. None therefore were to be had; and he sent for the two bishops, because he could have them alone. Accordingly we find, that though the bishops were come, and though the army spent a whole Lent with them afterwards in the camp, no farther succours either arrived, or were expected. But at this very period, Britain must have been full of a brave soldiery, Roman or British, or both, from one side of the island to the other†. That however was so small, as to be baptized in one day by two bishops. Nor let us believe with Usher's reporter, in order to invalidate this objection; that it was baptized in a river‡. It was baptized in a booth erected for the purpose, as "a church is framed and wattled together with leafy boughs." This, indeed, was a very large one, as it was "fitted up like a city." It might well be large for the baptism of an army; yet was still a booth only. In this were all baptized that were baptized, and all upon Easter Sunday. All therefore could not be many hundreds in number. Behold then the mighty host of warriors, which all the municipies and colonies of the Romans, all the castles and towns of the Britons, the whole of Roman Britain from the Channel to the Friths, after an interval of peace and prosperity for three hundred and fifty years, could muster up in a period of many weeks for the defence of the whole island!

"Washed by baptism," adds Constantius, "the army marches forth; faith kindles among the people; and, with contempt for the protection of arms, the aid of the Deity is expected. In the mean time, this institution or form of the camp is reported to the enemy;

† Hist. of Manchester, ii. 197, 200, octavo.

‡ Usher, 179: "In præter-fluente—fluviolo, sacro hinc exercitu baptizato."

“ who, presuming upon victory as going to fight with an unarmed host, “ hasten with additional alacrity. Yet their approach is known from the “ scouts: and when, after the Easter solemnity was past, the greater “ part of the army, fresh from the font, essayed to take arms and to pre“ pare for fight; Germanus offers to command them in battle. He chooses “ some light-armed soldiers, he traverses the country round, and, on the “ side from which the enemy’s approach was expected, he beholds a “ valley,” &c. §. When the Britons were baptized, not all, but only the main body, were. “ The greatest part of the army,” we have been told before, “ requested the saving waters of baptism;” and, as we are additionally told now, “ the greater part of the army” was “ fresh from “ the font.” The rest, therefore, neither desired nor received baptism.
 The rest, too, were not concerned in the victory afterwards; as only “ the—fresh from the font essayed to take arms.” What then became of the remainder? The author tells us not. They disappear from the eye, and flit away we know not whither. The baptized, however, march out of their camp, all animated with faith, all looking down with scorn upon the efficacy of earthly arms, and all relying upon the miraculous assistance of God. Yet this was a wild presumption, a presumption without a pretence. The enemy hear of their coming forth, and of their presumption visible in their unarmed condition. They therefore hasten to cut them in pieces, and for that purpose “ approach” them. But, by some strange doubling of the author upon his own steps, it immediately appears that the Britons have not yet marched out of their camp, and that the enemy have not yet “ approached” them. We are told indeed, that “ the army marches forth,” fired with faith, despising the protection of arms, and relying upon the assistance of God; that the enemy hear of § Constantius in Usher, 179: “ ‘Madidus baptismate procedit exercitus; fides fervet in “ populo; et, contempto [in Bede, very strangely, conterrito] armorum præsidio, Divinitatis “ expectatur auxilium. Interea hæc institutio vel forma castrorum [in Bede, as strangely “ again, castitatis] hostibus nunciatur; qui, victoriam quasi de inermi exercitu præsu-“ mentes, assumptâ alacritate festinant; quorum tamen adventus exploratione cognoscitur, “ Cùmque, emensâ sollemnitate Paschali, recens de lavacro pars major exercitûs arma capere “ et bellum parare tentaret; Germanus ducem se prælii profitetur eligit expeditos, circum-“ jecta percurrit, et e regione quâ hostium sperabatur adventus, vallem’,” &c.

their marching out, know them to be “unarmed,” and “hasten with “additional alacrity” to cut them in pieces. Yet we find afterwards, that the enemy’s “approach” is known only from the scouts, that then the Britons begin “to take arms and prepare for fight,” and that therefore they are still within their camp. In such a wild contrariety of circumstances, is the reader beat backwards and forwards! Constantius’s “un-“armed” host had actually “taken arms.” His soldiery, that had already marched out of the camp, and so had invited the enemy to hasten towards them, hears of their haste by its scouts, then takes arms, and then marches out. So little, indeed, did the Britons march forth without their arms; so little did they despise the protection of arms; and so little did they rely only on an expected aid from God; whatever the author says at first, in affirmance of all this; that he tells us at last, they acted just as any other army would have acted, went out with their arms in their hands, and took their ground for the battle with particular cautiousness. Their confidence in the miraculous aid of God, and their consequent scorn of earthly arms, end most amazingly—in their setting an ambuscade for the enemy.

Why however had not the Saxons and Picts attacked them, in all the long interval of time before? They had waited upon the Britons as these were cooped up in their camp, exposed more than these to all the severities of this winter-campaign; while the Britons sent for the bishops, while the bishops were coming to the Britons, while both were keeping Lent together, and while the main body of the army was baptized on Easter Sunday. They were unwilling to attack them assuredly, before the bishops had come to convert these heathens, before these heathens had finished their Lent with the bishops, before the bishops had baptized these heathens into Christians upon Easter Sunday. Even then they did not attack the Britons, but the Britons marched out to attack them. Yet the Britons act as strangely now as the Picts and Saxons acted before. They marched out to fight, but advance not towards the enemy. Earnest and eager for the battle, they loiter so much in their outset, as to hear of their enemy’s “approach” before they have marched out, before, indeed, they have stood to their arms. Confident of the power of God interposing miraculously in their favour, they march not in a brisk pace towards the enemy, they meet them not in high spirits about the midway of their approach, they “traverse the country round,” and then lay an ambuscade. The enemy too were “hastening with alacrity,” with “additional” or extraordinary “alacrity;” yet leave the Britons time to “choose some light-armed soldiers” to “traverse the country “round,” and to lay an ambuscade in the very front of their marching column. The Picts and Saxons were encamped near enough to the Britons, to see them march out of their camp, to behold them march out unarmed; yet, in crossing the small interval of ground between them, with all their “additional alacrity,” leave the Britons time to do this. So completely is the whole narration a mere chaos of agitated and shifting atoms, one atom dashing violently against another, all rearing their heads in billows of reciprocal opposition, and never to be composed into a creation by any hand but the divine!
God

“Germanus chooses some light-armed soldiers, traverses the country “round, on the side from which the enemy’s approach was expected,” as Constantius proceeds, “beholds a valley encircled with lofty hills; in “which place he draws up his new army, he himself acting as its leader. “And now came up a ferocious multitude of foes, which they saw to approach as they lay in ambuscade. Then suddenly Germanus their “standard-bearer admonishes them all, and foretells them, that they “should reply to his voice with one shout: and while the enemy were “in security, as trusting they approached unexpected; the two priests “cry out Alleluiah, and repeat the cry three times. One voice follows “all; and the enclosing mountains multiply the raised shout, by a reverberation of the air. The hostile soldiers are stunned with terror; “tremble for fear the surrounding rocks, for fear the very frame of the “sky should rush down upon them; and, in the consternation at their “hearts, believe their swiftness of foot will scarcely suffice to save them. “They fly on every side, they throw away their arms, rejoicing to have “saved their persons from the danger, at the expense of their arms. Even “several, in the precipitancy of their fear, were swallowed up by that “river which they had forded leisurely on their advance. The army un“hurt

“ hurt beholds itself avenged, and is made the idle spectator of a victory “ obtained. The spoils are collected as they lay on the ground, and the “ religious soldier acquires the booty of a heavenly victory. The prelates “ triumph, in a bloodless defeat of the enemy ; triumph for a victory ob“ tained, not by force, but by faith. The island therefore being now “ composed into a full security, and its foes, spiritual or carnal, being “ subdued, as the bishops had conquered the Pelagianists and the Saxons
 “ [and the Picts], to the grief of the whole country, they then effect “ their return *.” The Britons thus lay such an ambuscade as never was planned by the mind of man before. Nothing but a voice from Heaven could have recommended it ; yet they take it up without such a voice. They even determine upon it before they march out of their camp.
 They therefore detach their light troops to find out such a place, as they were determined should have a miraculous victory obtained at it. These “ traverse the country round” to find it, as if they were not acquainted with their own country ; and at last find it directly before their eyes, in the very front of their own camp, in the very avenue by which the foe was marching to attack them. The ambuscade is laid, and the foe comes. He is now “ a ferocious multitude” of men. The Saxons and Picts are a “ multitude,” yet have never assaulted the small army of the Britons

* Constantius in Usher, 179: “ ‘ Eligit expeditos, circumjecta percurrit, et, e regione quâ “ hostium sperabatur adventus, vallem circumdatam editis montibus intuetur ; quo in loco “ novum componit exercitum, ipse dux agminis. Et jam aderat ferox hostium multitudo, “ quam appropinquare intuebantur in insidiis constituti. Cùm subito Germanus signifer “ universos admonet, et prædicat, ut voci suæ uno clamore respondeant. Securusque hosti-“ bus, qui se insperatos adesse considerent, Alleluiah tertio repetitum sacerdotes exclamant.
 “ Sequitur una vox omnium ; et elevatum clamorem, repercusso aere, montium inclusa mul“ tiplicant. Hostile agmen terrore prosternitur ; et ruisse super se non solùm rupes circum“ datas, verùm etiam ipsam cœli machinam, contremiscunt, trepidationique injectæ vix suf“ ficere pedum pernicitas credebatur. Passim fugiunt, arma projiciunt, quodentes vel nuda “ corpora eripuisse discrimini. Plures etiam timore præcipites flumen, quod sensim venientes “ transierant, devoravit. Ultionem suam innocens intuetur exercitus, et victoriæ præstitæ “ otiosus spectator efficitur. Spolia colliguntur exposita, et prædam cœlestis victoriæ miles “ religiosus adipiscitur. Triumphant pontifices, hostibus fuis sine sanguine ; triumphant “ victoriâ fide obtentâ, non viribus. Compositâ itaque—insulâ securitate multiplici, supera“ tisque hostibus vel spiritualibus vel carne conspicuis, quippe qui vicissent Pelagianistas et “ Saxones [Pictosque], cum totius mœnore regionis reditum moliantur’.”

before; and a "ferocious" multitude, yet have been tamely inoffensive for so many weeks before. They come too "in security, as trusting "they approached unexpected;" those who knew of the Britons marching out of their camp unarmed, and hastened to cut them in pieces, knowing nothing of their light troops "traversing the country round," knowing nothing of their whole army taking possession of the woods in front. The Britons from their ambuscade beheld their approach, but they beheld not the Britons at all. They entered the hollow of the hills, and pushed along the line of the valley. Germanus therefore prepared to open his masked battery upon them. He had ordered his men to second his voice, and to repeat his cry. Then he and Lupus thrice repeated the wonder-working word Alleluiah. The whole army repeats it after them. The enclosing hills reverberate the sound. The Picts and Saxons are struck with consternation; fear they shall all be instantly crushed, by the rocks on their sides, or by the sky over their heads; throw down their arms, and fly.

Such is this miraculous victory, in all its circumstances! It is plainly, I must say,

An idiot's tale, told with sound and fury, Signifying nothing.

It is absurd in its parts; it is absurd in the whole; and the internal evidence is strong, vigorous, irresistible against it.

SECTION II.

YET internal evidence is often delusive. Let us therefore examine the external, and see whether this bears equally hard upon it.

"In the county of Flint," says Usher, the first who attempted to ascertain the scene of this memorable victory *, "near the town which

* Except that trifle, as I was ready to call him from report, or, as I ought to call him, that writer of whom I know not and wish not to know any thing, Polydore Virgil. "Non ad Trentani fluvium," says Usher, 179, "prout conjecturâ auguratus est Polydorus."

“ is denominated MOLD by the English and Guid-cruc by the Welsh, is “ this battle reported to have been fought, and the place to have retained “ from it, even to the present day, the name of MAES GARMON, which “ signifies the Plain of Germanus; this holy army being baptized in the “ little river Alen, that flows along one side of it †.” To whom Usher here refers as his reporter, is not told, and can only be conjectured. Whoever he was, his report was not worth the reference. The Britons are said by him to have been baptized in the river Allen, which flows along one side of the place; when we know them to have been baptized in a large booth. Nor could the Britons have been baptized in the Allen, if the Allen be the rivulet which the Picts and Saxons crossed, as they advanced, and in which some of them were drowned as they fled back; because the Allen must then have been at some distance, in front of the Britons.
 This river runs about a mile to the north-west of Mold, is there crossed now in the road from Wrexham to Holywell by a bridge, but was formerly crossed by a ford; and has upon its nearer or south-eastern bank the very field, to which Usher points as denominated Maes Garmon ‡.
 On this field has been recently built an obelisk, by a gentleman curious concerning any incidents relative to the history of the region, but without any evidence from tradition, as no tradition of a battle there exists in any part of the neighbourhood, and without any documents in writing, as his nephew, who now possesses his estate, knows of none.
 He built it merely, as the inscription upon the obelisk witnesses, by the very words of Usher’s Constantius, and of Usher himself, adopted through the whole; on what would naturally be thought by a person so adopting and so curious, the infallible authority of Usher. Thus one of this gentleman’s family, I suspect, first communicated his intelligence of the name, with his conjecture of the battle, in an excursion of Usher’s out of Ireland by Holywell and Wrexham into England; as, in the re-

† Usher, 179: “ In agro Flintensi, juxta oppidum quod Angli Mold, Cambro-Britanni “ Guid-cruc appellant, hoc gestum aiunt; indeque locum Maes Garmon, quod Campum “ Germani sonat, hucusque nomen retinuisse; in præter-fluente Aleno fluviolo, sacro “ hœc exercitu baptizato.”

‡ Gough’s Britannia, ii. 596; Owen’s Ogilby Improved (1764), p. 267; and private information from a very obliging clergyman in the neighbourhood.

operation of that intelligence or that conjecture from Usher again, another of them erected an obelisk §.

But the whole was a delusion, in Usher and his reporter; a delusion, resulting solely from the solitary circumstance of the name. Yet the name was so obscure in itself, even so unaccompanied by any tradition, that till Usher called it into notice by fixing this battle at the place, it was all unknown; and, even since Usher did this, has engaged little notice before the obelisk was erected. Leland takes no notice of it. Camden takes none. Lhuyd too, who so judiciously corrected and so usefully enlarged Camden's account of Wales, heard as little of it as either of them. He inserted, indeed, a mention of the name, with an application of it to the victory, in his additions; but inserted them only, in an express reference to the opinion of Usher about them. "Near this town," he says concerning Mold, "as the learned Usher supposes, was that celebrated victory which he calls Victoria Alleluatica—; adding, that in memory of that miraculous victory, the place is called at this day Maes Garmon ||." This is all which a native of Wales, a native of North-

§ The inscription is this: "A.D. CCCCXX," an error, Usher, p. 516, placing it in 430, "Saxones Pictique bellum adversus Britones junctis viribus suscepserunt," the very words of Constantius in Usher 179, "in hac regione hodieque Maes-garmon appellatâ," the inscriber's own words, and faulty, as denominating a field, a region, "cum in prælium descenditur," the inscriber's words again, "sub apostolicis ducibus Germano et Lupo Christus militabat in castris," the words of Constantius; "Alleluja tertio repetitum exclamabant," the words of Constantius again, "hostile agmen terrore prostravit," Constantius's words again, "triumphant hostibus fuis sine sanguine," the words of Constantius again, "palmâ," victoriâ in Constantius, "fide non viribus obtentâ," the very words of Constantius once more; "MP in Victoriæ Alleluaticæ," an appellation formed by Usher and peculiar to him (179 and 180), "memoriam N. G.," Nehemiah Griffiths, "MDCCXXXVI." Mr. Griffiths has thus transcribed his account of the battle literally from Constantius, has only put in some supplementary words de proprio penu, and has even taken Usher's very appellation of the victory for his own: and I suppose a former owner of the ground to have given the information to Usher; as I find, that he who erected the obelisk inherited the estate of Rhual, of which this field is a part, from "Robert Edwards a gentylman [who] dwelith," says Leland in Itin. v. 37, "at [Rhual, I suppose] on the side of Alen yn Molesdale, having plenty of wood and goodly medow by Alen side."

|| Gibson's Camden, 826.

Wales,

Wales, one peculiarly inquisitive and sagacious concerning the historical antiquities of his country, says upon the subject; knowing no more, than what Usher had told him. So insignificant was the name in itself! And the very obelisk, by the very tenour of the inscription upon it, all borrowed in terms from Usher, but neither in Usher, nor in its copy of him, hinting at any authority higher than mere supposition; proves no tradition of this battle to have existed at the field, when Mr. Griffiths erected that obelisk on it, or even when Usher pitched upon it as the scene of this battle.

Nor does the field in any manner correspond with the battle. The ground of this was a small, long, narrow valley, enclosed by two ranges of lofty hills at the sides, traversed by a road from end to end, and having a rivulet across the mouth of it, capable of “swallowing up” precipitate forders. But the place pitched upon for it, is only in general a level range of ground, intersected by the Allen, and only in particular a single field, upon the very bank of the Allen. “Mold,” says our Welsh traveller, himself equally Welsh with his subject, “consists principally of one broad and handsome street, on a gentle rising in the midst of a small but rich plain. The church is placed on an eminence.—At the north end of the town stands the mount, to which it owes the British and Latin names, Yr Wyddgrug and Mons Altus.—About a mile west of the town [I] visited Maes Garmon,” &c.*. The ground from Mold to the field, we thus see, is all a plain in general; and is therefore sunk into no valley in the middle, ridged up into no hills at the sides, and waving with no woods upon the latter over the former. The field too is itself a perfect level, I find from inquiry, five or six acres in extent. The river of it likewise, I equally find, is very shallow in its waters, having the ford Rhyd-goli, or the Clear, the Evident Ford, across it, and being therefore incapable of “swallowing up” any forders, however precipitate. Such ground as this does reason proclaim in her loudest note, can never be the place of such an action as that. There is not a single feature of similarity between the historical and the antiquarian ground of battle: they are as opposite as nature can possibly make them. The valley is all filled up, the hills are all pulled down, and the river is all transposed by the meddling hand of art. Nor could Germanus, if he was to visit his own place of ambuscade again, ever recognise it under its new form. The fact is, that this spot was selected for the place of the battle by that infantine imbecility of intellect, which took no pains to assimilate the scene to the story, which never presumed indeed to think of this necessary operation, and was fondly, credulously, implicitly,

* Pennant's Tour in North Wales, i. 419, 423, 437; the author still retaining that tradesman's token, of writing without a nominative case to his verb.

Led by the foolish tinklings of a name.

Nor should Usher have suffered himself to be deluded by such a reporter. He should have been startled at his application of the name to the history, instantly on his assertion that "the army was baptized in the "little river Alen;" an assertion, so contradictory to the narrative. But he should have been driven away as with a whirlwind from the whole, by his explanation of the name; so contradictory to the very operations themselves. Maes Garmon signifies not what Lhuyd, and Mr. Gough from him, renders the name, "St. German's Field," as "in memory of "that miraculous victory;" even though the margin adds, "Maes in the "names of places sometimes implies more particularly, that battles have "been fought there,—vide Anglesey *." The Welsh and the Bretoons indeed do sometimes use the word Maes in this signification, as we equally use the word Field, yet always with some addition to mark it for a field of battle; as, in the very name to which Lhuyd refers us within the isle of Anglesey, we have Kae y Maes Maur, which "implies some great battle "fought here," as it is literally the Field of the great Fight, in English †. But the general and the natural meaning of the word among the Bretoons or the Welsh, was and is the same as that of Magh in Irish, the same word with a little variation, a Plain or a Level Ground. In this sense the name corresponds exactly with the site, but is totally disconformable to the scene: and, as the very presenter of the name to Usher became the explainer of it to him, the presenter was so struck with the correspondency of the name, yet so inattentive to the disconformity of the scene, that though he rendered the name in the dubious manner of Lhuyd, a mere Plain, yet with Lhuyd again he boldly interpreted it at once into a Plain of Battle. There “is this battle reported to have been fought,” as Usher cites him reporting, “and the place to have retained from it, even to the present day, the name of Maes Garmon, “which signifies the PLAIN of Germanus *.” By this single stroke the reporter should have awakened Usher from his dream of antiquarianism, and forced him to reflect for one moment upon the incompetency of a plain for his victory, upon the dissonance of the name to the narrative, upon the contradiction in the localities to the facts. Usher would thus have resigned up the appellation for ever, to unite itself no longer with history, to stand only the title of a common field, to indicate only the site of a chapel probably, dedicated once to St. German, and existing so late, perhaps, as the very days of Leland †.

* Gibson's Camden, 826; and Gough's, ii. 596.

† Gibson, 810.

The field has lent its name to a farm of sixty-four acres that nearly surrounds it, yet is totally distinct from it. The former belongs to Mr. Griffiths, but the latter to the lord of the manor. This circumstance corroborates my supposition, that the field was once the site of a chapel, dedicated like the adjoining church of Llan-armon to our own saint, Germanus. Upon the whole, therefore, from the full contrariety of the scene to the story, the obelisk overlooking a plain instead of a valley, and rising from the area of a level field instead of the ridges of two parallel hills, that monument stands the witness of its own falsity; records a victory in its inscription, which it denies in the very aspect of the ground about; proclaims a battle to have been fought upon the field, while the field protests against the proclamation from every feature of its face; and thus,

Like a tall bully, lifts its head, and lies.

* Usher, 179: “Maes Garmon, quod Campum Germani sonat.” Maes is ordinarily used for a field in general by the Welsh of this day.

† Leland's Itin. v. 37: “There longe 3 chapelles onto it,” the parish of Mold. Only two of the three exist at present, Nerquis and Tryddyn (Liber Regis). The third probably was here.

“ It is to be considered,” adds Usher, however, endeavouring to bring up an accession of strength to his cause, yet doubtful of his power, and fearful of a failure, “ whether this victory is not also alluded to in that “ passage of Gregory’s writings : ‘ The omnipotent God, while the “ clouds were brightened over with light, hath burst the gates of the “ sea ; because, by the illustrious miracles of the preachers, he hath “ brought even the ends of the world over to the faith. For behold ! “ he hath now penetrated the hearts of almost all nations ; behold ! he “ hath united the limits of the East and West in one faith. Behold ! “ the language of Britain, which knew only how to grunt its barbarous “ tones, hath long begun to sound the Hebrew Alleluiah in the praises “ of God. Behold ! the ocean, formerly swelling, is now reduced into “ service under the feet of the saints ; and its barbarous movements, “ which the princes of the earth could not subdue with the sword, are “ tied up through the fear of God by mere words from the lips of the “ priests ; and he, who in his state of infidelity never dreaded the troops “ of the warriors, in his state of belief now fears the tongues of the “ humble. For as, by the hearing of the words of Heaven, and by “ the bright shining of miracles, the virtue of divine knowledge is in- “ fused into him ; by the terror of the same Deity he is so reined “ in, that he is afraid to do ill, and wishes with all the desires of his “ heart to attain a gracious eternity’*.” These rhetorical words, it seems, have been applied by Bede, by Johannes Diaconus the old biographer of Gregory, and by Aimoinus the old historian of the Franks, to the conversion of the Saxons in Britain; but Usher sufficiently exposes the absurdity of the application, by noting that very writing of Gregory's, in which the words are found, to have been published in 591, some years antecedent to Augustine's arrival from Gregory, for the conversion of the Saxons*. Smith too, in his annotations upon Bede, has very properly added to the decisive remark; by observing one of the terms in the main clause of all, "long since," to point at an event of a much older date†. Yet neither the main nor any other clause, has the slightest reference to that victory. This is apparent at once, from the face of the whole. The whole alludes to one event; not a slight, a private, a transitory fact, but a fact permanent, general, and important; not the occasional victory of a small party of Britons over a petty host of Picts and Saxons, but the grand victory of the Gospel over the Britons themselves. "The omnipotent God," says Gregory "—hath burst the gates of the sea,—hath brought even the ends " of the world over to the faith,—hath—penetrated the hearts of almost " all nations,—hath united the limits of the East and West in one " faith." This speaks in the plainest language of the general predominancy of the Gospel among the nations of the earth. Gregory then comes to a particular nation, that of the Britons; as one, that by its remoteness and its insularity peculiarly corroborated this general assertion.

* Usher, 179, 180 : “ Videndum, annon huc etiam spectat illud Gregorii. ‘ Omnipotens enim Deus, coruscantibus nubibus, cardines maris operuit ; quia, emicantibus prædicatorum miraculis, ad fidem etiam terminos mundi perduxit. Ecce enim ! penè cunctarum jam gentium corda penetravit ; ecce, in unâ fide orientis limitem occidentisque conjuxit. Ecce ! lingua Britannię, quæ nil aliud noverat quam barbarum frendere, jamdudum in divinis laudibus Hebræum cœpit Alleluia resonare. Ecce ! quondam tumidus, jam sanctorum pedibus substratus, servit oceanus ; ejusque barbaros motus, quos terreni principes edomare ferro nequiverant, hos, pro divinâ formidine, sacerdotum ora simplicibus verbis ligant ; et qui eætervas pugnantium infidelis nunquam metuerat, jam nunc fidelis humilium linguas timet. Quia enim, perceptis cœlestibus verbis, clarescentibus quoque miraculis, virtus ei divinæ cognitionis infunditur ; ejusdem divinitatis terrore refrænatur, ut pravè agere metuat, ac totis desideriis ad æternitatis gratiam pervenire concupiscat’.”

* Usher, 180: "Etsi—ad gentis Anglorum conversionem a Bedâ (Histor. lib. ii. cap. i.), et Johanne Diacono (Vit. Gregor. lib. ii. cap. 39), et Aimoino (De Gest. Francor. lib. iii. cap. 74), ista trahi non ignorem; quo minùs tamen ad illorum accedam sententiam, vel illud me cohibet, quòd, ante missum ad Anglos Augustinum, expositionem Jobi a Gregorio (Regest. lib. i. epist. 41, indict. 9, ann. 591, et lib. iv. epist. 46, indict. 13, ann. 595) editam fuisse animadverterim."

† Smith at Bede, 120: "Hoc," this passage in Gregory, "Beda ad Anglorum conversionem retulit, ii. 1, et post eum J. Diaconus in Vita Gregorii [et Aimoinus]; non observato; quòd liber ille scriptus erat ante Anglorum conversionem, ac promode hæc verba "Gregorii prælium hujus capitæ," the battle with the Saxons and Picts, "ejusque alleluia, "[minimè] respexerunt," Smith thus setting his feet in the very steps of Usher; "præsertim, "cùm id ut jamdudum factum prædict." The omission of the principal word in Smith's sentence above, is very remarkable; as it sets the face of the whole directly contrary to the author's intention.

“The language of Britain,” he remarks, “which knew only how to grunt its barbarous tones, hath LONG SINCE begun to sound the Hebrew Alleluiah in the praises of God.” So much higher set was the rhetoric of Gregory, than to glance at a slight incident in a provincial history! The lightning of heaven streams in one of its flashes across the whole compass of the sky. The eagle of heaven sweeps, in one of its flights, along the whole extent of the horizon. The soul of Gregory was mounted upon the wing of an eagle, and rode upon a beam of the lightning, when he composed the passage above. Yet Usher attempted to confine the lightning within a little closet, and to thrust the eagle into a child’s cage; when he endeavoured to lower the lofty passage into an allusion to his humble victory. Gregory, in truth, thought as little of the battle in Flintshire, as St. Jerome, who lived long before it, thought, when he spoke of Christian churches at Rome in similar language, and thus expressed himself concerning the similar worship of God in them: “the psalms resounded, and alleluias, echoing on high, “shook the gilded ceilings of the temples†.”

Yet, as error, once floated, spreads in a circle over all the surface of a still water, by not merely extending its own ring, but by generating other rings of a weaker kind; “Gildas, a British author, who wrote in “the sixth century,” adds Mr. Carte, moving in the circle generated by Usher’s, “alludes to this victory as obtained by the blessing of God, without any human assistance; which sufficiently appears from the circumstances of the relation§.” The passage in Gildas, to which Mr. Carte refers, is said to be in “Epist. n. 17, 18,” and is actually in Hist. c. xviii. But the passage has no more connexion with the Alleluiah victory, than it hath with the battle of Pharsalia, or the engagement off Actium. It speaks, indeed, of a victory, but one totally different from Germanus’s. Gildas, in a preceding part of his history, notices what he calls “the first devastation;” when “Britain, being trampled down for † Hieronymi Opera, i. 130, Franc. et Lips. 1684: “Sonabant psalmi; et aurata tecta templorum, reboans in sublime, quatiebat alleluia.”

§ Carte, i. 182, 183.

“ the first time by two transmarine nations outrageously cruel, by the “ Scots from the north-west, by the Picts from the north, lies for many “ years stunned and groaning*.” He afterwards notices “ the second “ devastation,” when “ those former enemies” again carry destruction through the country†. He then comes to “ the third devastation,” in which “ the black bands of Scots and Picts” again ravage the country‡.
 He finally goes on in his xviiiith chapter, to speak “ of the victory;” and subjoins thus: “ then first they [the Britons] made a slaughter among “ the enemy,—trusting not in man but in God, according to that ex“ ample in Philo, the divine aid becomes necessary when human assistance “ fails. The audaciousness of the enemy was repressed—, the enemy “ retired out of the country§.” This victory, therefore, had nothing miraculous in it, and is expressly ascribed by the author to the exertions of the Britons. These “ made a slaughter among the enemy;” not standing like the Britons of Germanus, “ the idle spectators of a victory “ obtained,” but wielding their weapons to obtain it, and dealing destruction around them in obtaining it. Nor were the Britons of Gildas engaged, like the Britons of Constantius, against Picts and Saxons, but against Picts and Scots. So very different in the nations opposed, and in the battle fought, is the victory of Constantius from the victory of Gildas; that the one has scarce any similarity with the other!

“ In Constantius’s narration of the Alleluiah victory,” subjoins Usher, to all, willing to remove every objection if he can, and to lend his fable the full credibility of truth, “ is a difficulty yet remaining to be explained; “ how the Saxons are here introduced warring with the Britons, when “ their arrival in the island seems posterior in time to the legation of

* Gildas, c. xi. : “ De primâ vastatione.—Britannia,—duabus primùm gentibus transma-“ rinis vehementer sævis, Scotorum a Circione, Pictorum ab Aquilone, calcabilis, multo“ stupet gemitque per annos.”

† Gildas, c. xiii. : “ De secundâ vastatione.—Illi priores inimici,” &c.

‡ Gildas, c. xv. : “ De tertiâ vastatione.—Tetri Scotorum Pictorumque greges,” &c.

§ C. xviii. : “ De victoriâ. Et tum primùm inimicis—strages dabant non confidentes in “ homine sed in Deo, secundùm illud exemplum Philonis, necesse est adesse divinum ulli “ humanum cessat auxilium. Quievit parumper inimicorum audacia,—recesserunt hostes a “ civibus.”

“ Germanus. This knot Matthew of Westminster and Carolus Sigo“ nius cut in two, because they could not untie it; substituting the word “ Scots for Saxons in the history. Bede, Paulus Diaconus, and Frecul-“ phus, deserting the calculations of Prosper in ascertaining the time of “ Germanus’s legation, stated this victory to have been obtained in the “ reign of the emperor Marcian, after the arrival of the Angles. On the “ contrary, Camden, peculiarly learned in the antiquities of his country, “ has retained the chronology of Prosper for the first expedition of Ger“ manus, but from Nennius’s interpolator throws the arrival of the “ Angles into the year immediately preceding; here neglecting the senti“ ments of Bede, and of all the Anglo-Saxon writers, concerning the time “ of their own arrival. But we have a very easy opening without these “ windings, if we consider that the Saxons had been used to invade “ Britain frequently, long before the arrival of Hengist here. For in the “ beginning of the reign of Valentinian the 1st, as we are informed by “ Ammianus Marcellinus, the Saxons, no less than the Picts and Scots, “ distressed the Britons continually with their ravages; and Claudian “ introduces Britain in the reign of Honorius, thus singing concerning “ Stilicho,

“ Through him no more the Scottish sword I fear,
 “ No more I tremble at the Pictish spear,
 “ No more I shrink to see the SAXON sails “ Crowd all my shores, and wave in all my gales.

“ And the Notitia Imperii shews us, that a count of the SAXON shore “ in Britain was appointed, for the defence of the island from their “ ravages*.” Such difficulties have always occurred to the examining mind,

* Usher, 180, 181: “ In Constantii de Alleluatico illo triumpho narratione, difficultas “ adhuc explicanda superest, quâ ratione Saxones cum Britonibus belligerantes hic indu-“ cantur, quum eorum in insulam adventus Germani legatione tempore videatur fuisse “ posterior. Eum nodum Matthæus Florilegus (Flor. Histor. ann. 448), et Carolus Sigo“ nius (de Occidental. Imper. lib. 12, ann. 429), cùm solvere non potuissent, dissecurerunt; “ Scotorum pro Saxonum in historiâ substituto vocabulo. Beda (in lib. de Sex Ætatib.), “ Paulus Diaconus (in Addit. ad Eutrop. lib. 15), et Freculphus (Chronic. tom. 2, lib. 5, “ cap. 16), a Prosperi rationibus in tempore legationis Germani designando recedentes, post “ adventum Anglorum sub Marciano imperatore victoriam hanc partam fuisse statuerunt.
 “ Antiquitatum patriarum scientissimus Camdenus contrâ (Britan. p. 95), in primâ Ger“ mani

mind, in attempting to reconcile the battle of Constantius with the known history of the times. All but Usher referred it, as common sense required they should refer it, to a period posterior to the arrival of the Saxons; only differing concerning the very year of that arrival. Yet all who dated it after the Saxon arrival, whatever common sense might suggest in their favour, were certainly not right; and Usher, who has noticed their opinions without refuting them, who yet has advanced a different opinion of his own, is as certainly wrong. The battle of Constantius thus seems to be neither posterior nor prior to the Saxon arrival; and is, however paradoxical the assertion may seem, actually neither.

That it could not be posterior, two or three reasons will sufficiently prove. Germanus and his associate could not have sailed from France to Britain, as they really sailed, if the Saxons were already here. Those very prelates to whom Constantius ascribes the Alleluiah victory, “enter the ocean,” as Bede tells us; “and even to the middle of the passage by which you cross from the Gallic bay into Britain, the vessel flew safe with prosperous gales.” Then a storm comes on; but “a serene tranquillity ensues, the contrary winds return to minister to the voyage, and, having run over the sea in a short time, they enjoy the peace of their wished-for shore*.” They thus embarked at the usual port “mani profectioe Prosperi chronologiâ retentâ, ex Ninii interpolatore Anglorum adventum in annum proximè præcedentem conjicit; Bædæ et Anglo-Saxonicorum omnium scriptorum de sui adventûs tempore sententiâ hîc neglectâ. Sed absque istis diverticulis facillimus patebit exitus, si consideraverimus, longè priùs quàm appulset hîc Hengistus, frequenter Saxonas irrupere consuevisse in Britanniam. Nam in principio imperii Valentiniani I. Saxonas, non minùs quàm Pictos et Scotos, Britannos ærunis vexavisse continuis, auctor est Ammianus Marcellinus (Histor. lib. 26); et sub Honorio Aug. de Stilichone ita canentem introducit Claudianus Britanniam,

Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
Scolica, ne Pictum tremierem, ne littore toto Prospicerem dubiis venturum Saxona ventis.

“Et, ad insulam ab eorum impetu defendendam, institutum fuisse comitem littoris Saxonici per Britanniam, Notitia Imperii indicat.”

* Bede, i. 17: “Germanus—et Lupus—intrant oceanum, et usque ad medium itineris, quo a Gallico sinu Britannias usque tenditur, secundis flatibus navis tuta volabat.—Tran-

quillitas

port in France, and landed at the usual port in Britain. What then were these? Bede himself shall tell us: as "Britain," he says, "has
 "Belgie Gaule on the south, the nearest shore of which is opened to "passengers from the city called Portus Rutupis, by the English now
 "corrupted into Repta-caestir," or Richborough near Sandwich; "the "sea interposing between it and Gessoriacum," or Boulogne, "the near- "est shore of the nation of the Morini," in Gaule †. But if the Saxons had been then arrived in Britain, and hostilities had been then commenced by them against the Britons; the port of Richborough must have been shut up to these, or any other, passengers from France. The Saxons were fixed at the very first, and before these auxiliaries of the Britons became the invaders of Britain, on that very isle of Thanet, which formed the harbour of Richborough, by presenting an opening for it between itself and the mainland of Britain. "The nation of the Angles;
 "or Saxons," as Bede himself informs us again, "being invited by the "king aforesaid, is brought into Britain in three gallies, and, by the "command of the same king, takes up its residence at the eastern part of "the island ‡." But, as Nennius writes more explicitly, "there came "three keels [or gallies] driven into banishment from Germany, in which "were Hors and Hengist;—Vortigern received them kindly, and deli- "vered to them the island which in their [he should have said, in their
 "and our] language is denominated Tuneth§." This island thus became

"quillitas serena subsequitur, venti e contrario ad itineris ministeria revertuntur, decursio-
 "que brevi spatiis pelagi, optatâ litoris quiete potiuntur."

† Bede, i. 1: "Habet a meridie Galliam Belgicam, cujus proximum litus transmeanti-
 "bus aperit civitas quæ dicitur Rutubi Portus, a gente Anglorum nunc corruptè Repta-
 "caestir vocata, interposito mari a Gessoriacò, Morinorum gentis litore proximo."

‡ Bede, i. 15: "Anglorum sive Saxonum gens, invitata a rege præfato, tribus longis
 "navibus Britanniam advehitur, et in orientali parte insulæ, jubente eodem rege, locum
 "manendi—suscipit."

§ Nennius, c. 28: "Interea venerunt tres chiulæ, a Germaniâ in exilio pulsæ, in quibus
 "erant Hors et Hengist;—Gortigernus autem suscepit eos benignè, et tradidit eis insulam
 "quæ linguâ eorum vocatur Taneth." M. Westm. 394, interprets "chiula" to be a galley, "longas naves quas cuylas sive galeas appellant." The Saxon language has still ceof, a ship, and cæle, a keel. Yet keel is still retained for a ship at Newcastle upon Tyne, though from M. Westm. alone we know the precise import of it as a galley at first. Bede's expression

came the point; from which they afterwards prosecuted their invasion of Britain †. The harbour of Richborough, therefore, was possessed, at that period, by the vessels of the Saxons; and all intercourse between France and Britain, at that grand port of passage into the latter, must have been totally precluded to those French prelates. To shew this in the most striking view, I will notice an incident of history, much later in time, and consequently more emphatical in import. After the Saxons of Kent, and the Saxons of many other parts of Britain, had been brought within the pale of humanity and the Gospel; Wilfrid, a Saxon bishop of the new Christians, was returning from France into Britain. He steered for the old port of passage in Britain, Richborough, the town of which had now descended from the hill of the castle, had settled on the very sands of the sea, and was therefore beginning to be denominated as it is now, Sandwich ‡; but was driven upon the coast of Sussex, then addicted equally as it was of late to the plundering of wrecks, then addicted tenfold more, as not restrained by the civilizing genius of Christianity. The Saxons of Sussex were not converted yet, but left to the operations of their own heathen spirit, and to the heathen consideration of a state of nature being a state of hostility in man to man. Such was the influence of this consideration, and of that spirit in Sussex then, that the chaplain and biographer of the bishop speaks of the coast, just as we should speak of the Moorish shore of Africa at present. “The south-east wind blowing hard,” he says, “the whitening heads of the waves threw them upon the region of the South-Saxons, with which they were unacquainted.—But the Gentiles, coming expression of “longas naves” for what Nennius calls “chiulæ,” indeed, might have suggested to us before, and does confirm at present, M. Westminster’s interpretation. But how comes Nennius, a Briton, to use the Saxon term; and Bede, a Saxon, the Roman one? The name galley itself comes evidently to us and to the French, from the Italians and their galea; a different word from galea, a helmet in Latin, and accented, even spelled, differently, as in this line of M. Paris (p. 530):

In terris galeas in aquis formido galeias.

† Nennius, c. 46.

‡ Eddius’s Vita Wilfridi, c. xiii. in Gale, i. 58: “Portum Sandwich;” the first mention of it under that name, in all our history.

“down

“ down with a very great army, resolved without delay to seize the ship, “ to divide the money as plunder among themselves, to carry off as “ slaves those who yielded, and to slay with the sword those who resisted §.” Yet these were countrymen to the bishop and the crew, these were near neighbours to the new Christians. What then would not the Saxon pirates have done, all equally in the ferocity of nature, less civilized from the very business of their lives, and more barbarous from their very banishment, as the outcasts of society, as the provoked enemies of all mankind; to the stranger bishops, and to the stranger Christians, coming from France into their harbour, and anchoring near to their vessels? They would certainly have seized, and probably have murdered them immediately.

Had indeed the Saxon invasion then commenced, the whole region of Roman Britain must have been in too violent an agitation of spirits, too much inflamed with a high and raging fever in its veins; ever to have invited the prelates into it. The Pelagian heresy would have been considered as an evil much less formidable in its nature, and much less pressing in its encroachments, than the Saxon invasion. The controversies of theology would have been resigned up, to a period of peace and leisure. All thoughts, all exertions would have been employed, in preparing for the new war, in preventing the ruin of all Britain, in precluding the destruction of all Christianity.

So incompatible is the very victory, said to be obtained by the bishops over the invading Saxons, with the very coming of the bishops into Britain! But if, with Bede, we fix the arrival of the Saxons in the year 449*; the Saxon invasion necessarily ranking still later in time, and § Eddius, c. xiii.: “ Navigantibus—eis de Galliâ Britannicum mare,—flante—vento “ euro-austro durè, albescentia undarum culmina in regionem Australium Saxonum, quam “ non noverant, projecerunt eos.—Gentiles autem, cum ingenti exercitu venientes, navem “ arripere prædam ibi pecuniæ dividere, captivos subjugatos deducere, resistentesque gladio “ occidere, incunctanter proposuerunt.” Wilfrid and his men however escaped, pushed off to sea, and gained their port, “ prosperè in portum Sandwich atque suaviter pervenerunt.”

* Bede, i. 15.

Germanus dying in 448 †, this good bishop must have fought the battle and won the victory, one year at least after he was dead ‡. The victory and the battle, therefore, if at all real, could not possibly have happened posterior to the general invasion of the Saxons §.

Usher accordingly had recourse to a new hypothesis, which is not exposed to these invincible objections, which has gained an universal acquiescence ever since, and has actually carried the narration of Constantius into our national history. Yet this hypothesis lies open to similar objections, and is just as untenable as the other. That the narration refers to a period, when the Saxons were hostile and invasive; is apparent upon the very front of it. But that it also refers to a period much prior to the general invasion by the Saxons; is equally apparent. The narration forms a part of that history, which relates not to the second expedition of Germanus, but to the first; which recites the incidents that arose during the legation, not of Germanus and Severus, but of Germanus and Lupus ||, which therefore speaks of events that happened, not so late as even 447, but so early as 429-430 *. The Saxons of Constantius then must be, what Usher states them to be, some Saxons that existed in the island many years prior to the general invasion; if they ever existed in it at all. But they never existed; nor is it

† Usher, 204, 205.

‡ Lhuyd in Gibson, 826, says thus: "Whereas it may be objected, that seeing it is allowed St. German dyed in the year 435, it was impossible he should lead the Britons in this island against the Saxons, for that Hengist and Horsa arrived not here till 449; he [Usher] answers," &c. Lhuyd thus, by a mistake of memory, confounds Camden's chronology with Usher's, and substitutes that very chronology in Camden which Usher refutes, for the very chronology which Usher proposes himself.

§ We naturally think with Usher, 180, that "Bede, and all the Anglo-Saxon writers" are the properest judges "of their own arrival in Britain;" if we do not reflect, that the computation of time from the Christian æra was not begun by any before 525, that it was not adopted by many till one or two centuries afterward, and that therefore various errors must necessarily have arisen, in the retrospective application of it to events.

|| Usher, 179: "Victoriam Alleluaticam Germano et Lupo ducibus—obtentam." See also Bede, i. 17-20.

* Usher, 175.

in the power of Usher to exert a kind of Promethean art; and to lend life to these mere statues fabricated by Constantius's hand.

The Saxons undoubtedly harassed the shore of Britain, before they took up their residence in Thanet. Yet they harassed it not, as Usher makes Marcellinus to say they did, "continually," and "no less than the Scots and Picts," even "in the beginning of the reign of Valentinian I.:" because, what Marcellinus says of the Saxons then, what he says of the Saxons at any other time, has NO REFERENCE TO THE ISLAND, but is ALL CONFINED TO THE CONTINENT†. The Saxon descents upon BRITAIN did not BEGIN as early, as even the close of Marcellinus's history, the year 378‡. So very unfortunate is Usher, in his first reference to history! So long has Marcellinus been repeated from him to say, what Marcellinus never says! So carelessly have the references of this truly great man in historical criticism, been echoed from mouth to mouth, and transmitted from pen to pen, without one examination through the course of a century and a half!

Even when the Saxon invasions began upon our shores, even when they were prosecuted in their utmost violence, they were not prosecuted, as Claudian in the laxity of poetical language insinuates they were, upon every part of the shore. They harassed only one part of it, and this not on the western or Welsh side of the isle, but on the contrary or eastern; not even upon the eastern along the whole range of the shore, at any point towards the north, at any about the middle, but at the lower end of all to the south, at the grand bend of the isle on the south-east. This is † Usher, 181, cites "Ammian. Histor. lib. 26," but means lib. 27, where, in p. 494 (Paris, 1681), he notices the Saxons, the Picts, and the Scots, for the first time; where he harasses the Britons with the Scots and Picts, but the Gauls with the Saxons: "Picti,—et Scotti, per diversa vagantes, multa populabantur; Gallicos verò tractus Franci et Saxones, iisdem confines,—violabant." The mention of the Saxons in lib. 28, p. 522, is merely allusive; "quam ob causam præ ceteris hostibus Saxones timentur, ut repentini." The only other mention in Marcellinus, is at p. 536, 537; where the scene is equally in Gaul, as the final feat was in Germany, "in ipsis Francorum finibus," says Orosius in a note here.

‡ Marcellinus, lib. xxxi. p. 655.

plain from the very fact alleged for his own purpose by Usher, the Roman appointment “of a count of the Saxon shore in Britain.” Where this count’s jurisdiction lay in Britain, and how far it extended along the coast of Britain, we know with the greatest precision from the very “Notitia Imperii,” alleged by Usher. “Under the disposition,” says this record, “of that dignified officer, the count of the Saxon shore “in Britain,” are troops at these forts specified; “Othona” or Ithan-cester near Maldon in Essex, at “Dubris” or Dover, at “Lemannis” or Limne near Hythe, at “Brannodanum” or Brancaster in the north of Norfolk, at “Gariannonum” or Caster on the Yare in the south of it, at “Regulbium” or Reculver in Kent, at “Rutupis” or Rich-borough in Kent, at “Anderida,” I know not what place in Sussex, and at “Portus Adurni” or Aldrington near Shoreham in Sussex §. Thus we find the Saxon shore of Britain to have been all confined between Aldrington in Sussex, and Brancaster in Norfolk. So little did it extend into North-Wales, as Usher has extended it; that it reached only a few miles, upon either side of the South Foreland! Accordingly, when the Saxons appeared for the last time off the shore of Britain, and from intended invaders became hired auxiliaries; they were then at this very angle of the island, were landed on the isle of Thanet, and from the isle of Thanet marched into the interiors of the country. All assistance, therefore, in support of Constantius’s narrative, as derived from the existence of a Saxon shore prior to the general invasion by the Saxons; is merely the vision of a dream, a ghost that glides before the § Pancirollus, fol. 161: “Sub dispositione viri spectabilis, comitis litoris Saxonici per “Britanniam. Præpositus—Othonæ. Præpositus—Dubris. Præpositus—Lemannis. Præ-“positus—Brannodunesis Brannoduno. Præpositus—Gariannonensis Gariannono. Tri“bunus—Regulbio. Præpositus—Rutupis. Præpositus—Anderidæ. Præpositus—Portu “Adurni.” For appropriating these ancient names to modern places, see Camden, 247.

 Somner’s Roman Forts and Ports in Kent, 103-106; Horsley, 488; Ives’s Gariannonum fairly considered; and Gough, i. 206. Camden’s reasons for fixing Anderida at Newcastle in Kent, are refuted at once by history itself. Anderida being a town of the Ebenni, who inhabited between the Cantii of Kent and the Belgæ of Hampshire (Richard, 18; and Ella, the founder of the South-Saxon kingdom, completing his conquest of Sussex by the reduction of Andredecester (Huntingdon, f. 179).

eye of fancy, a form that is all unsubstantial when you attempt to embrace it.

Ter conatus ibi collo dare brachia circum,
Ter frustra comprehensa manus effugit imago,
Par levibus ventis, voluerique simillima somno *.

But let us attend to another feature, in the complexion of this false history. From the isle of Thanet the Saxons penetrated in time to North-Wales, and reached the banks of the Allen at last; but not till many hundreds of years after Germanus had visited the country. Yet Usher exhibits them in Flintshire during Germanus's visit, and not merely by themselves, but in company with Picts also. This circumstance forms an additional note of spuriousness upon the narration, though Usher has entirely overlooked it. The Picts and the Scots, it is true, invaded the Roman half of Britain repeatedly, but never in union with the Saxons, and never in North-Wales. The Picts particularly, whom Usher has carried with the Saxons into that country, were even more unlikely than the Scots to enter it. "Britain," says Gildas, as I

* "Maes Garmon," says Mr. Pennant, "a spot that still retains the name of the saintly commander, in the celebrated battle of the Victoria Alleluatica, fought in 420," 420!!! "between the Britons, headed by the bishops Germanus and Lupus, and a crowd of pagan Picts and Saxons, who were carrying desolation through the country." He then gives an account of the battle, which is true in itself, but all at variance with the ground: "It has been objected by cavillers," he adds, "that the Saxons were not at that time possessed of Britain," when no one ever objected they were not possessed of the country, because the whole story proves they were not; and the only objection has been, what indeed Mr. Pennant means to state, though he has been unfortunate in his language, that they had not yet begun their reduction of the isle. "That may be admitted," though it is expressly called a cavil before; "but the learned Usher overthrows the objection," though the objection "may be admitted," as we have been told just before, "by rightly observing, that those 'people' were not indeed possessed of Britain, and thus overthrows the objection by allowing it, but "had long before made temporary invasions of our island, and committed great ravages in several parts; and calls to witness Ammianus Marcellinus," who witnesses no such thing. "And to his authority I MAY ADD," what Usher himself has expressly added, "that the Romans found it necessary to have, in the later times, a new officer to watch their motions, and repel their invasions, a comes littoris Saxonici per Britannias." (Tour in North-Wales, i. 437, 438.) Such are writers of travels, when they become critics in history! so honest to others, so just to truth, so dignified in themselves!

have

have cited him before, “ being trampled down for the first time by two “ transmarine nations outrageously cruel, by the Scots from the north-west,” that is, across the Clyde from Argyleshire, their original seat of residence in Britain ever since the year 320 ||; “ by the Picts from “ the north,” that is, across the frith of Forth, from the regions of Caledonia beyond; the two nations thus evading the wall of Antoninus between the friths, by transporting themselves over the water of both, so breaking into the Roman province of Valentia, between that wall and Severus’s, “ lies for many years stunned and groaning.” This shews us the nature of the Pictish and Scottish irruptions in a lively form. The Scots and Picts had an embarkation for the purpose; but then it was merely to float them over the two friths, to give them that access into the country which the more northerly wall prohibited, and to land them on the visible shore at the other side: they then overran the country up to the southerly wall, and ravaged all the present lowlands of Scotland, from Falkirk even to Berwick. They therefore penetrated not, either by land or by water, into North-Wales; and never came within one hundred and fifty miles from it: even if either of them had penetrated so far, these would not have been the Picts, but the Scots. The Picts invaded the country from the north-east, and the Scots from the north-west: the latter therefore must have been the enemy that would range along the road from Carlisle to Chester; while the former would range in a parallel direction, from Berwick towards York. Even if the Picts had turned in upon the course of the Scottish ravages, had given up their own course to the Scots, so had crossed obliquely from Edinborough to Carlisle and Chester, yet they did not, they could not, act in union with the Saxons. The Saxons indeed are all within another hemisphere, as it were; they are on the other, the eastern side of the island, and at the south-eastern angle of it; they must therefore be brought across the breadth of the whole, like the Picts; and across a breadth as oblique, but much more ample, than theirs, before the Picts and they can be united together, before we can accom-moderate this particular narrative to the general history. The position of the universe must be altered before this Ptolemaic system can possibly be adopted; general history stands like the sun in the Copernican, the centre of gravitation to all the lesser orbs about it, and the grand regulator of all their movements.

|| Hist. of Manchester, ii. 250, octavo.

But, as Gildas goes on still more explicitly to describe what he calls “the second devastation” of the Picts and Scots, “those former enemies,—borne along with the wings of oars, by the arms of rowers, “and with sails bellying in the wind, break through the borders, kill all before them, and mow down, trample upon, pass over, as ripe corn, “all that come in their way*.” We thus see the Scots and Picts invading Roman Britain now, just as they invaded it before; crossing the friths with sails and oars, entering the country from the borders, and ravaging it up to Severus’s wall again: we see them also still without any party of Saxons among them. Then they were “hastily driven “back beyond the seas” by some Roman auxiliaries sent to the Britons; and the more hastily, “because they greedily transported their annual “booty across the seas when they met with no resistance†.” So clearly does Gildas continue to fix the Picts and Scots on the north of the friths, and to make the country immediately south of the friths the only scene of their ravages, while he gives a different and a distant scene to the descents of the Saxons! “The Romans,” he says, only alluding to the Saxons, not specifying them, but plainly indicating them, “on the “shore of the ocean in the southern clime, where their navy was kept,” meaning Richborough particularly, the grand port of their navy for Britain‡, “and where they were apprehensive of the wild beasts of

* Gildas, c. xiii.: “Illi priores inimici—alis remorum, remigumque brachiis, ac velis “vento sinuatis, vecti, terminos rumpunt, cæduntque omnia, et quæque obvia, maturam “seu segetem, metunt, calcant, transeunt.”

† Gildas, c. xiv.: “Auxiliatores egregii—prosperè trans maria fugaverunt, quia anni- “versarias avidè prædas, nullo ob-istente, trans maria exaggerabant.” I have supplied a clause in the text above, as necessary to connect the remark with the fact.

‡ Hist. of Manchester, ii. 509, quarto.

“ Barbary, fix towers at intervals for a survey of the sea §.” Gildas thus places his towers, and thus points his apprehensions, on and at the Saxon shore of Britain!

But when he relates what he calls “ the third devastation,” and what he states as the last, “ the black bands of Scots and Picts,” he says, “ emulously emerge from the coracles, in which they were borne across “ the rale of the sea, and,—with more than usual confidence, seize from “ the natives all the northern and extreme part of the land, up to the “ very wall || :” even this they attack, this they storm, and pour into the country on the south. How far they went, and whether they met (if they ever met) with any Saxons, may seem not easy to be ascertained; I formerly supposed them to have pushed only through the bishopric of Durham into the county of York, yet two years afterward to have returned and penetrated into Lincolnshire ¶. But, as Gildas expressly asserts the Picts to have never returned any more *, I now see the necessity of reducing both these invasions into one; of dating them both as one in the year 448, the ascertained year of Germanus’s death in Italy, the real year of Artius’s third consulship too†, and of carrying this invasion as far to the south as Lincolnshire; then, in the very same year, accidentally came a party of the Saxons upon the coast, as we are told by Nennius, were invited to land as auxiliaries, and as auxiliaries engaged in battle with the invaders. This engagement both Gildas and Nennius have suppressed, in their natural dislike for men who proved

§ Gildas, c. xiv.: “ In litore quoque oceani ad meridianam plagam, quæ naves eorum “ habebantur, et inde Barbaricæ feræ bestię timebantur, turres per intervalla ad prospectum “ maris collocant.”

|| Gildas, c. xv.: “ Emergunt certatim de curicis, quibus sunt trans Tithicam [Tethycam] “ vallem vecti,—tetri Scotorum Pictorumque greges,—et—solito confidentiùs omnem aqui- “ lonalem extremamque terræ partem pro [read ab] indigenis muro-tenus capessunt.”

¶ Hist. of Manchester, ii. 528, quarto.

* Gildas, c. xix.: “ Picti in extremâ parte insulæ tunc primum, et deinceps, requie- “ verunt.”

† As Carte, i. 192, fixes the year, and as the death of St. German in 448 obliges all to fix it. Hist. of Manchester, therefore, in ii. 513, quarto, must stand corrected.

so perfidious afterwards, unjustly stifling the truth‡: but at a later period two Saxons, or two who in the predominance of the Saxons considered themselves as such, did them the justice which the Britons had denied. “The engagement being begun,” says Bede, “with the enemy who had come from the north, the Saxons gained the victory§.”—“The Saxons,” adds Huntingdon in that very spirit of Bede, which shews the Saxon prejudices operating equally as the British before, to the hurt of history, “entered into an engagement against the Picts and Scots, who had now come even to Stamford, which is situated in the “southern part of Lincolnshire, distant from Lincoln forty miles; when “therefore those,” the Saxons, “had fought with their javelins and “lances, and these,” the Picts and Scots, “had very keenly contended “with their axes and broad-swords, the Picts [and Scots] could not “bear so strong a pressure upon them, but provided for their safety by “their flight: the Saxons triumph in victory, and enjoy the booty||.” Thus do all these opposing historians unite together against their wills to make up that truth in one whole which they have respectively given in parts only; to shew both the Britons and Saxons employed in obtaining this victory, those as principals, these as auxiliaries! Such and so local was the battle, which exhibits to us the associated Picts and Scots

‡ Gildas, c. xviii. “De Victoriâ,” says only, “dabant strages,” and thus confines the victory to the Britons. Nennius suppresses all mention of the victory; yet Gildas says what plainly allows the Saxons were to fight for the Britons, telling us in c. xxiii. that a resolution was formed by the Britons concerning the Saxons, “in insulam ad retrudendas aquilones gentes intromitterentur;” adding, that the Saxon host accordingly landed “quasi pro patriâ pugnaturus, sed eam certius impugnaturus.” Nennius also notices, that “ipsi promiserunt expugnare inimicos ejus fortiter;” and introduces the Britons, telling them, after the battle at Stamford undoubtedly, “recedite a nobis, auxilio vestro non indigemus.”

§ Bede, i. 15: “Inito—certamine cum hostibus qui ab aquilone ad aciem venerant, “victoriam sumpsêre Saxones.”

|| Huntingdon, f. 178: “Inierunt autem certamen contra Pictos et Scottos, qui jam “venerunt usque ad Stanfordiam, quæ sita est in australi parte Lincolnæ, distans ab eâ 40 “milliariis: cum igitur illi pilis et lanceis pugnarent, isti verò securibus gladiisque longis “rigidissimè decertarent, nequiverunt Picti pondus tantum perferre, sed fugâ salutem suam “consuluerunt; Saxones victoriosi triumpho et prædâ potiti sunt.”

for

for the last time, but the Saxons with them for the first, in the Roman regions of Britain ¶ !

The Picts then were united, not with Saxons, but with Scots, in their only three invasions of Roman Britain. In the first, when they broke into the country between the two walls, and retired into their own Caledonia unopposed, they had Scots with them, but no Saxons; in the second, when they broke into the same country again, but were beat back into Caledonia by the Romans, they had equally no Saxons with them, but only Scots; in the third and last, when they broke through both the walls, and even pushed as far to the south as Stamford in Lincolnshire; they had Saxons with them indeed, but had also Scots, and Scots as associates, but Saxons as enemies. There indeed was the one only engagement at which the Picts and the Saxons were ever united in battle with the Britons, when the Saxons and the Picts

¶ In Hist. of Man. ii. 537, 538, quarto, I have wrongly interpreted these words of Gildas, concerning the future pacificeness of the Picts: “Picti in extremâ parte insulæ tunc “primùm, et deinceps, requieverunt, prædas et contritiones nonnunquam facientes.” The last clause I have interpreted as implying one more incursion into Britain, which I then believed to have been made, and therefore supposed to be meant here; but as I now see no such incursion to have been made, to be positively denied indeed by the first and second clause, I cannot interpret the last, in direct contradiction to them and to fact. That the Picts then and afterwards rested from incursions, is explicitly affirmed; and therefore the plunderings or harassings sometimes made by them afterwards, must be acts very consistent with the resting before; yet not acts merely of a private, a petty nature in their own country, as the mind is ready to suppose at first, but, as such a notice taken of them shews, acts of invasion and hostility upon one another; acts of plundering aggression committed by Picts upon Scots, and the very beginnings of that war between them, which ended finally in the total reduction of the Picts by the Scots. Thus Fergus, who began to reign about A. D. 503, half a century later than this irruption of Scots and Picts into Roman Britain (Innes, ii. 690, 691), but eighty years earlier than Gildas’s writing (Hist. c. xxvi.), extended the kingdom of the Scots beyond its original limits in Argyleshire, within which it had been settled by a prior Fergus (Hist. of Man. ii. 250, 251, octavo), and carried it a good way into the country of the Picts (Innes, i. 87; ii. 665, 666, 669, 674). We thus allow for the two Fergus’s that have so much divided the Scottish antiquaries (Innes, ii. 666); thus assign a pointed meaning to these hitherto unheeded words of Gildas; and thus fix historically the commencement of that war between the two nations, which then gave, which still gives, such a new aspect to the internal history of our whole island.

were actually opposed to each other, when the Picts were confederated with the Scots, and the Saxons were associated with the Britons against both.

So wild and so false, in every view that we can take of the subject, is Constantius's account of the Alleluiah victory! So requisite was it, even for Germanus's sake, to strip off the false and monstrous covering of hair with which ignorance and imposition have endeavoured to ornament his head, in order to shade his baldness, like Cæsar's, with a just and becoming crown of laurel! Constantius's story requires the highest degree of evidence to authenticate it, yet has not even the lowest; it is clogged with a vast variety of absurdities within; it is loaded with the greatest incredibilities without: it is at last reduced into a mass of historical impossibilities, each speaking loudly against itself, all uniting in one powerful acclaim against all. Thus is the narration finally found to be one of the most extraordinary fabrications that were ever imposed upon the historical world; projected with infinite confidence of falsehood at a time very near to the incidents, yet executed with little judiciousness of fraud, little knowledge of Britain, little regularity of ideas; triumphing, however, in its victory over the belief of man for no less than twelve hundred years together; but appearing, on a close examination, infinitely wild in itself, actually incredible in every part, and absolutely impossible in the whole.

F I N I S.

THE LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
Santa Barbara

THIS BOOK IS DUE ON THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW.

Series 9482

